All-party coalition formed to fight Thatcher on jobs

By Philip Webster, Political Reporter

An Anti-Thatcherite coalition of senior politicians of all parties, industrialists, former top civil servants, leading churchmen, trade unionists and journalists is being created to attack the Government's record in employment and to promote alternative policies.
The alliance, which will embrace all political philosophies apart from the Conservative right-wing and will include former prime ministers, is being formed amid great secretory to gain the maximum impact from its launch. But it is understood that Downing Street has been alerted of its existence.

Sir Ian Gilmour, a former Conservative Cabinet minister and one of Mrs Margaret Thatcher's most outspoken critics, Mrs Shirley Williams, president of the Social Democrats, and Mr Michael Meacher, a member of Labour's shadow cabinet, will have leading positions in the organization.
The aim is to set up a research body, to be called the Employment Institute, to analyse the causes of unemployment and to push remedies for its reduction.
It will have a board of trustees and a 100-strong council, whose members will include Mr Denis Healey, the former Labour Chancellor, and Sir Douglas Wass, former permanent secretary to the Treasury. There are also prominent positions for Mr James Callaghan and Lord Wilson of Rievaulx, former Labour prime ministers.

Mr Edward Heath has been invited to join.

The chairman of the trustees is to be Sir Richard O'Brien, former chairman of the Manpower Services Commission who was dismissed by Mrs Thatcher. He was largely responsible for the introduction of the Youth Training Scheme, and is now chairman of the Policy Studies Institute.

A driving force behind the group is understood to be Professor Richard Layard, professor of economics at the London School of Economics.
The body's all-party nature, emphasized by the appointment of Sir Ian, Mrs Williams and Mr Meacher, as vice-chairmen of the trustees, is designed to spike a government counter-attack.

Although the original aim was a launch at the beginning of May, it has been decided that it would be wrong to do so - given the involvement of all parties - then in county council elections.

The plan will embarrass the Government. The letter of invitation to join the council sent to public figures says that its aim is to replace "the tide of defeatism about unemployment and re-establish the notion that government policy can and does affect unemployment for good or ill."

It states it is acting on behalf of people "who share our concern about the current and prospective level of unemployment." The exercise is two-pronged. Apart from the establishment of the institute, the objective is to launch a charter for jobs to promote public discussion "and to develop public awareness of the scope for action to tackle unemployment."

Recent opinion polls have confirmed that the Government's record on the jobless will form the main battleground in the run-up to the next general election. A MORI poll published in The Standard this month found that 85 per cent of respondents regarded unemployment as one of the most important issues facing Britain.

Output rises as more go to work

By Sarah Hogg, Economics Editor

The output of Britain's production industries rose by 1.7 per cent in the three months to February, compared with the preceding three months and manufacturing output rose by 1 per cent, according to new figures. But manufacturing employment fell by an average of 6,000 a month.

However, the employment department estimates that total employment rose by 142,000 in the last quarter of 1984, taking the total increase for the year to 348,000. Self-employment is thought to have risen by about 200,000; the number of employees in the service industries went up to 240,000, but the number of jobs in other industries fell by 100,000.

The rate of increase in earnings slowed down between February and March, when the 12-monthly increase slowed to 7.4 per cent. But Mr Tom King, the Employment Secretary, said the rise was still "too high".

IMF leaders seek debt solution

By David Smith, Washington

The IMF's latest meeting in Washington yesterday socrated several new proposals to defuse the continuing debt crisis as more African and Latin American nations fall deeply in arrears on their payments.

At the same time, ministers attending the joint spring meeting of the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank examined the IMF's latest review of the world economic outlook and the fund's forecast that there would be only a modest decline in European unemployment - from 10.75 per cent to 9.75 per cent by 1990.
This is the forecast prepared from the IMF's baseline projection, which assumes an average rate of growth of just over 3 per cent. The IMF's latest review is designed to persuade banks to continue their loans to Colombia despite the Latin nation's refusal to accept an official IMF programme.

In both the informal and formal sessions, the worsening plight of African nations, faced with drought and widespread starvation, is a dominant issue.
Sudan, faced with mounting economic problems and a new government which must win the support of the IMF, is deeply in arrears on about $130 million in payments to the fund. The IMF must decide how it plans to proceed in its repayment talks with Sudan and other African nations.

Mr Nigel Lawson, the Chancellor yesterday told the executive committee of the IMF that world economic conditions were the best in six years. After a painful period of adjustment, the major economies were now pursuing convergent policies which offered the prospect of sustained growth.

Mr Lawson is sceptical about the prospect for major reform of the international monetary system.
Asked by reporters about the proposal of the US Secretary of the Treasury, Mr James Baker for a special meeting on reform of the international monetary system, Mr Lawson said: "It is not entirely clear what he is proposing." He expected any changes in the system would be modest.

Mr Paul Volcker, chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, said that competition was putting pressure on banks to engage in risky investment activities. He told a House banking sub-committee that Congress should expand banking powers and liberalize Federal restrictions on interstate banking.

Labour to keep home loans aid

By Anthony Bevis Political Correspondent

Mr Neil Kinnock yesterday repudiated any suggestion that Labour might wipe out mortgage interest tax relief, a possibility raised in a conservative paper issued by Mr Michael Meacher, shadow social services spokesman, on Monday.

The Labour leader has been incensed by the political reaction provoked by Mr Meacher's plans for the reform of the welfare state, which included the introduction of a housing allowance which would penalise tenants or owner-occupieds earning more than £15,000 a year.

He said in a BBC radio interview yesterday:
"I am very annoyed with the way in which Michael Meacher's suggestions have been treated, especially since he went to considerable pains all along before Monday and on Monday, to demonstrate that these were proposals for discussion and not party policy."

Mr Kinnock also said yesterday that he was "astounded" that The Times should have given front-page prominence to Mr Meacher's statement on Tuesday. He hoped Labour would reduce unemployment by one million within five years.
Labour policy is to create an additional million jobs with in two years.

The Labour leader said yesterday that Mr Meacher's statement had been "so obviously a slip of the tongue".
The allegations

The allegations

● Inadequate preparation areas to isolate cooked from uncooked food, allowing the possibility of cross-infection and growth of salmonella.
● Inadequate checks on refrigerated food, which was being kept at temperatures too high or too low.
● Food not being cooled quickly enough or reheated inadequately.

It was an isolated incident and did not reflect the overall standard of hospital kitchens.

presented the information to Mr King, said the union had

Premier quits over Beirut militia war

From Robert Fisk, Beirut

After a night in which the militias of West Beirut turned the Muslim sector of the city into a place of terror and violence, killing at least 29 people and wounding 120, Mr Rashid Karami resigned as Lebanese Prime Minister yesterday in protest at what he called the "horrific nightmare" unleashed on the capital.

President Gemayel later asked Mr Karami to remain as a caretaker prime minister, but half of Beirut remained last night in the hands of hundreds of Shia Muslim and Druze gunmen.

For more than 12 hours, militiamen from the Amal Shia Muslim movement and the Druze Progressive Socialist Party, had fought their way house by house and office block by office block, through the darkened streets of the city, firing rocket-propelled grenades and heavy machine guns indiscriminately into homes and hotels in a ferocious attempt to liquidate the rival Sunni Muslim Morabitoun militia.

For much of the night, the sky was lit by the fires from burning cars and houses, the screes resounding to massive explosions as convoys of ambulances took the wounded to overcrowded hospitals.

"No one can justify what is happening in our capital," Mr Karami said in a radio broadcast yesterday. His resignation may prove to be only symbolic, aimed at forcing the militias off the streets, but there can be no doubting that the Lebanese state

- if it can still be said to meet the definitions of a nation - is passing through yet another grave crisis.

With pro-Israeli Christian militiamen rebelling against the President and with the Israelis themselves on the point of a further withdrawal in southern Lebanon, the Lebanese Cabinet appears to be in as much danger of destroying itself as the country it is supposed to govern. The collapse of any vestige of government rule in west Beirut yesterday will appear to many to be the last straw.

In theory, the street battles started because the Morabitoun wanted to open a party office in a suburb controlled by Amal.
But in fact what took place yesterday was little more than gang warfare on a massive scale, with Druze militiamen eagerly joining in on the side of the Shia Muslims in order to rid themselves of their Sunni rivals.

The fact that Palestinian gunfights also joined in the battle near Corniche Mazran on the Morabitoun side added another, even more serious dimension to the fighting. "Beirut is at war with itself," the left-wing As Safr newspaper said in

Judge discharges spy trial jury

The jury at the Central Criminal Court which was due to hear an espionage trial was discharged yesterday for legal reasons - which the judge ordered not to be disclosed - less than a day after being sworn in.

A new jury will be chosen on Monday after a panel of vetted potential jurors has been drawn up.

On Tuesday eight serving and former members of the Armed Forces pleaded not guilty to 31 charges under the Official Secrets Act in a case that could continue until next September.

The defendants served with a signals unit in Cyprus and the alleged offences occurred between 1982 and 1984.

The jury was sworn in on Tuesday afternoon from a panel of 140 people. Eighty-four potential jurors were called before the jury was completed.
Of those 13 were challenged and Mr Justice Stocker accepted excuses from 59 members of the panel who could not sit for a long trial.

Heffer comes to defence of princess

By Richard Evans and Alan Hamilton

Mr Eric Heffer, the Labour MP for Liverpool Walton, last night sprung to the defence of Princess Michael and accused newspapers, including the Daily Mirror, of acting "absolutely disgracefully" for revealing his father's SS connections.
He was cheered by MPs when he told the Commons: "It is important that somebody, particularly on the left of the Labour party, should make it quite clear that we are not against people because their parents might have been Nazis or, in this country, Mosleyites or anything else."

"We are opposed to what those people stood for, not where their children stand. I think we have got to make that absolutely clear."

Mr Heffer, a member of the Labour Party's national executive, said: "I don't know her, I will never meet her, I don't particularly want to meet her, I don't know what her politics are. I am sure they are opposed to everything I believe in."

"But nobody, I repeat nobody, can be responsible for their parents."
Princess Michael of Kent said yesterday that she had called for evidence from Germany to prove that her father, whom she has admitted was a member of Hitler's SS, held only an honorary position.

In an interview recorded on Tuesday afternoon and broadcast by TV yesterday morning, the princess said that her father, Baron Gunther von Reibnitz, had been a member of the SS had been "a total shock to everything I had been taught to believe". She had been brought up, she said, to believe that the SS had stood for such things as concentration camps.

"I have now discovered that he was not involved in anything like that at all."

A Buckingham Palace spokesman said yesterday that the princess had had a large number of messages from members of the public, with the overwhelming majority supporting her.

Yesterday's TV-am interview caused its own dispute, after the BBC taped the programme and rebroadcast it on its own rival Breakfast Time news-programme. Mr Justice Walton yesterday afternoon granted TV-am an injunction banning BBC from broadcasting its pirate edition.

Anger at All Black visit to S Africa

By Our Foreign Staff

The announcement by the New Zealand rugby authorities that the controversial All Blacks tour of South Africa will go ahead later this year caused furious reaction yesterday around the world, including South Africa.

The decision of the New Zealand Rugby Union, flying in the face of much public opinion at home, to accept the South African invitation was immediately described as disgraceful by the Wellington Government.

It dominated the meeting in Cape Town between the New Zealand Prime Minister, Mr David Lange, and his Australian counterpart, Mr Bob Hawke.

Mr Lange, returning from a tour of Black Africa intended to forestall complaints against his Government, described the England tour

decision as regrettable and "to the eternal shame" of the rugby union.

In Lusaka, The African National Congress - the banned South African black organization - said the players could risk their lives. The country was in a state of civil war, it said; they could get caught in the crossfire. "Nobody can guarantee their safety," said a spokesman.

Bishop Desmond Tutu, Anglican Bishop of Johannesburg, said the planned tour was scandalous and would enrage anti-apartheid campaigners, while the president of the Union of African Sports Confederations called on the continent to end sporting links with New Zealand.

In contrast, Dr Danie Craven, president of the South African Rugby Board, described it as a bold decision which was "tremendous news for the cause of sport against politics".

But Mr Frank van der Horst, president of the South African Council of Sport, said the tour showed the "immoral acceptance of the evil system of apartheid".

The announcement ends months of speculation and signals the start of a protest campaign which many fear will see violence return to the streets on the pattern of the Springbok tour of New Zealand in 1981.

Mr John Minto, head of the anti-tour organization Hart, promised last night in Wellington to wage a 12-week campaign which will bring protesters on to

Assurances sought

Perth - Australian cricketers chosen for this year's tour of England will be replaced if they refuse to sign a compulsory declaration by next Tuesday.
Mr Fred Bennett, the chairman of the country's cricket board said yesterday (Reuters reports).
Mr Bennett said: "The board is taking seriously the strong rumours that a number of Australian cricketers will undertake a tour of South Africa in November 1985." He refused to give details of the declarations contents, but it is believed that if a player were to sign and then tour South Africa, he could be banned from playing for Australia.

Heseltine wants franchised firms to run Navy dockyards

By Anthony Bevins, Political Correspondent

Mr Michael Heseltine, Secretary of State for Defence, said yesterday that he favoured a franchise operation for the Royal Dockyards, with Devonport and Rosyth, along with their workforce, leased out to independent commercial operators.

Mr Heseltine told the Commons that he was not announcing a final decision on the yards, which employ 20,000 people and have an annual turnover of £400 million. "I am opening a period of consultation."

But he left little doubt that he intended to legislate for outside commercial management of the yards by the end of 1987.

Mr Denis Davies, Labour defence spokesman, said the consultative process to be completed by July 5, was cosmetic and a farce. "The Government's top option might be all right for a fast-food burger but it is unacceptable for the repair of warships."

Mr Heseltine said: "The proposal provides the best way forward since it secures continuing competition while maintaining control over the national strategic assets involved."

It would create a "latter, more flourishing enterprise", able to compete for non-defence contracts. In a personal message to the workforce, which is to be cut by 2,000 in the meantime, Mr Heseltine said that the franchise system was favoured and preferred.

But his announcement of job losses caused distress and dismay from the local MP, Miss Janet Fookes (Plymouth, Drake), and Mr Robert Hicks, South East Cornwall.

Dr David Owen, SDP MP for

Plymouth Devonport, said that dockyard workers would feel a deep sense of betrayal and Mr Heseltine's operation for the Royal Dockyards, with Devonport and Rosyth, along with their workforce, leased out to independent commercial operators.

A ministry booklet explaining the scheme, said: "Commercial companies with the appropriate management expertise and standing would be invited to tender for a contract, for a fixed period of years, to undertake at negotiated prices a substantial portion of the Navy's repair and repair requirements. Separate contracts would be in such a case be let for each dockyard."

"The contractors would use the dockyard assets (land, buildings and facilities, including plant and machinery) on terms to be agreed, but ownership would remain with the Government."

Special companies would employ the workforces at each yard, ownership of those companies would then pass to the franchise-holders and would be passed on to successor contractors. Security would be maintained by ministry police.

Trade unions reacted angrily to Mr Heseltine's announcement, saying they would resist the introduction of commercial management (David Felton writes).

Mr Jack Dromey, national officer of the Transport and General Workers Union, said that the Government was trying to "inflict a grocery competition on the Navy, irrespective of the harm done to Britain's defences".

TUC ponders changes in its labour law strategy

By Our Labour Editor

Trade union leaders decided yesterday to continue their boycott of the Government's labour law, but left the door ajar for possible changes in the strategy.

The TUC's Employment Policy and Organisation Committee "noted" a policy paper on union experience of the legislation. The paper urged the general council not to initiate any changes in the Wembley Conference programme of opposition.

But the document acknowledged that unions are increasingly coming round to the view that it is "necessary or even desirable" for them to reshape their practices to comply with the law on pre-strike ballots.

The committee agreed to keep the matter under review, leaving the way clear for moderate unions that want to push through tactical changes.

Among those pressing for change are the Union of Communication Workers, the British Airline Pilots' Association, the white-collar union Apex and Mr Clive Jenkins' ASTMS. The TUC paper conceded: "If it becomes clear in time that there is a gap between TUC policy and what is happening on the ground, this policy will need urgent reconsideration."

However, that time has not yet come, the TUC argues, so unions will remain for the time being under instructions not to take the Government's money for pre-strike ballots and executive committee elections.

The Renoir exhibition at the Hayward Gallery is now London's biggest single art attraction, with queues far longer than those for stage shows such as Cats or top pop concerts.

The Arts Council's show includes 99 paintings and one sculpture by the French Impressionist artist who died in 1919. The long queues along the South Bank are expected to last until the minute it closes on Sunday.

An Arts Council spokesman said: "People have been queuing outside for hours even during the snow. The problem has been getting them through the gallery, there is a limit to how many people we can cope with in one day."

The exhibition, organized by the Arts Council with sponsorship from IBM, has attracted more than 335,000 people since it opened on January 30, an average daily attendance of 4,407 people paying between £1.50 and £2.50 each. By comparison, the musical Cats, which is playing to capacity audiences, has about 9,000 paying customers a week.

The exhibition moves to Paris and then to Boston after it closes in London. The show includes paintings from many private and public collections, one from the Pushkin, the other from the Hermitage.

The success of the Hayward exhibition has proved to be an embarrassment for the Greater London Council which owns the gallery but leases it to the Arts Council.

The GLC wants to make the gallery a London people's arts centre, but its efforts have been thwarted by the threat of legal action by the Arts Council.

Echoes of the year-long national coal strike

Pit deputies' leaders urge overtime ban over closures

From Craig Seaton, Nottingham

Leaders of the pit deputies' union Nacods yesterday recommended its 17,000 members to vote for an immediate overtime ban, claiming that the National Coal Board had gone back on an agreement over proposed pit closures.

The secret ballot, due to start on May 10, requires a simple 50 per cent plus one majority. If it is carried, its impact would be more severe than the miners' overtime ban. It could cut coal production by about a quarter.

Delegates attending a Nacods national conference in Nottingham yesterday insisted that the vote would be carried unless the coal board withdrew its plans to shut pits affected by the year-long miners' strike without first submitting the proposals to a modified review procedure.

Mr Peter McNestry, general secretary of Nacods, said the board's proposals to assess the problems at certain pits affected by the coal strike broke the agreement made between the two sides under the alphas of the Advisory, Coalitions and Arbitration Service last October which prevented a national strike by its union. Members had voted by 82 per cent for industrial action.

Mr McNestry said: "We had an agreement with the coal board at Acat that all proposed pit closures would go through the modified review procedure and that was confirmed by the Secretary of State for Energy, the minister for coal and the Prime Minister. The board is now reneging on that October agreement."

He said the 50 delegates at yesterday's meeting had been particularly angered by a statement from the coal board on March 27 which said that assessments were being carried out at pits where damage had occurred because of the miners' strike. The statement had given a warning that in some circumstances where the cost of recovery could not be supported by a viable long-term future the "damage" may be judged to be "permanent and irreparable".

The statement also said: "In the disarray of Nacods - that such a post-strike strategy 'should not be regarded as action within the industry's normal joint procedures. Those procedures will be fully resumed when the detailed assessments have been made'."

The board's proposals over the future of pits - particularly Bedwas in South Wales and Frances in Scotland - brought from Nacods a threat of possible new strike action in the coalfields. Although the union has pulled back from that, leaders yesterday insisted that their men are sufficiently angered by the board's attitude to vote for an overtime ban.

The coal board said last night it would not comment on the Nacods meeting until it had heard officially from the union but a spokesman denied the board had taken a decision to close Bedwas colliery (the Press Association reports).

Twelve hundred miners at Askern colliery, near Doncaster, in the Yorkshire coalfield, were on strike last night over a dispute about production bonuses (Peter Davenport writes).

The men walked out earlier this week in an argument about rates of pay to be set when a newly commissioned coalface goes into full production.

At a mass meeting yesterday they decided to stay out for the rest of the week. A branch meeting of the union is to be held at the weekend when the men will decide on further moves.

NUM asks rebels to drop litigation

By Paul Routledge, Labour Editor

The National Union of Mineworkers is making overtures to "dissident" moderates in the Yorkshire area in an attempt to end the litigation that led to the union being put into the hands of a receiver.

It has been suggested that now the year-long strike is over, the NUM leadership and its critics ought to come to terms, allowing the case over which the union was fined £200,000 for contempt to be dropped.

But lawyers acting for the two Manton colliery miners, Mr Robert Taylor and Mr Kenneth Foulstone, are understood to be insisting on immunity from action against the two men under the NUM's new disciplinary procedures, the so-called "star chamber".

If an informal agreement cannot be reached, the full trial against the union for calling the strike without a ballot will go ahead. However, it is being argued that the 1984 Trade Union Act has ensured that NUM leaders will not be able to call a strike in similar circumstances and as the last dispute is now over there would be little point in pursuing the case.

However, the mineworkers' union's legal troubles are far from over. The High Court yesterday adjourned until next week an application for the lifting of an injunction banning expenditure on mass picketing.

Mr Richard Slove, counsel for the working miners, told Mr Justice Scott that if the injunction was lifted, the union could spend some of the £1.75 million still in its funds for retrospective payments to strikers who took part in mass pickets.

There are also still a number of other legal cases pending. They include the original "right to work" action brought by Nottinghamshire working miners, and the action that seeks to make the 25 members of the NUM national executive personally responsible for the £200,000 contempt fine.

But other cases relating to particular events that took place during the coal conflict have been dropped, and the NUM is expected to make early moves to free itself from the High Court sequestrators who were appointed last November to take money from union funds.

TV crews 'contributed to pit gates car attack'

From Tim Jones, Cardiff

The presence of cameras and the behaviour of television crews contributed to a violent attack on a car driven by a Welsh working miner's wife, a court was told yesterday.

Magistrates at Aberdare, Mid Glamorgan, were told that a hostile crowd waiting outside a smokeless fuel plant were informed by a television crew on the scene that Mrs Joy Watson, a back-to-work campaigner, was about to arrive at the works.

Mr Gerald Jones, representing four women accused of threatening behaviour, said: "A clearer exhortation to arm yourself for battle there cannot be. I do not say that excuses what happened. But there is an element of incitement, of encouraging these people to act, which can only be described as playing to the camera."

Earlier demonstrations, when cameras had not been present, had been peaceful. Eight defendants, one man and seven women, admitted threatening behaviour likely to cause a breach of the peace. They were each given a prison sentence of two months suspended for a year.

Mr David Rowlands, the supervising magistrate, said: "Scenes shown nationally on television caused a lot of disturbance throughout the country as a whole. The very presence of TV cameras seems to have caused some of those scenes. Their very presence caused you to react in a way they might not have done if they had not been there."

Mr Michael Ryan, for the prosecution, said Mrs Watson was confronted by a number of protesters as she drove her husband to work and home again on the day of the incident in March.

Confrontation had reached "boiling point". It was close to mass hysteria, he said. "Missiles were thrown at the vehicle."

The right accused were: Royston Griffiths, taxi driver, of Park View Terrace, Abercromby, and Glamorgan; Angela Hunkin, of John Street, Abercromby; Deborah Hobbs, of Hawthorne Terrace, Mountain Ash; and Lynwen Hobbs, of John Street, Abercromby.

Deborah Brace and Lunwen Hobbs were also bound over in the sum of £150 to keep the peace for a year and ordered to pay £35 compensation for damages Mrs Watson's car.

Ms Deborah Davies, of Park View Terrace, Abercromby, elected a crown court trial and was remanded on unconditional bail until May 22. She was accused of causing bodily harm to Mrs Watson.

Lynne Morgan, of Hawthorne Terrace, Mountain Ash, agreed to be bound over in the sum of £150 to keep the peace for a year, after a charge of threatening behaviour was withdrawn.

Pontefract magistrates court sent 25 miners for trial yesterday on charges arising out of an alleged attack on a working miner, Mr Michael Fletcher, at his home at Castleford, West Yorkshire, last November (the Press Association reports). They were allowed bail.

Bank staff vote on action

By Our Labour Correspondent

Barclays Bank employees who belong to a staff association have voted to take industrial action, with the result that the bank could suffer an overtime ban from May 1 unless there is an increase in a 5.5 per cent pay offer.

The recommendation for industrial action was made by the non-TUC Clearing Banks Union, which represents staff associations in Lloyds, Barclays and National Westminster. Nationally the union failed to achieve the 75 per cent majority, on a 67 per cent poll, necessary under its rules to authorize action.

However, staff in the Barclays Group Staff Association registered a 62.7 per cent vote in favour of action, which exceeds the recently introduced rule specifying that a 60 per cent majority is required before official action can be taken.

Bank union leaders have called for fresh talks with the banks

Commentary

Geoffrey Smith

Mrs Thatcher has never needed much prodding to do something about the rates. She could well echo the words of Churchill in another context: "I am something of a prod myself."

In the October 1974 general election she was the Shadow minister who presented the Conservative pledge to abolish the rating system. The party lost the election, but she has never forgotten the promise. If she and her colleagues required any further incentive to action it has now been provided by the bruising experience of revaluation in Scotland.

The broad effect of this exercise has been to ease the burden on business and to increase it on householders. In other words, to help the ratepayers without a vote and to hurt those with one. This may accord with the doctrine of accountability that local authority spending should have an impact on the electorate - but it is not smart politics.

Scottish Conservatives are in turmoil and the deficiencies of the domestic rating system have been imprinted all the more firmly on ministerial minds. It is too narrowly based and too inflexible without frequent revaluation, and it would be unthinkable for the Government to impose a repeat of the Scottish upheaval on England and Wales. More revaluation is out.

Argument not on merits of rates

The critical argument in this Government, however, has never been on the merits of domestic rates, but on what could replace them. The air is now filled with reports of a poll tax, or a residents charge as one is led to believe is the polite term.

This idea is not a swift and simple response to Scottish grief. The Department of the Environment has begun its inquiry into local government finance last year, and there are other possibilities under consideration, a local income tax, and some kind of consumer tax, presumably a sales tax. But a poll tax is the department's front-runner and ministers must be particularly eager at the moment to settle on something.

The advantage a poll tax is that, as nearly everyone would pay it, all voters would have a direct interest in their local authority's level of spending. There are, however, some difficulties. I am not thinking principally of the objection that such a scheme would involve in effect a charge for being on the electoral register.

That list does not include aliens, who are not eligible to vote, but are liable to be taxed, and a different register would probably be drawn up for a poll tax. Even if it were not, it is hard to imagine that Mrs Thatcher would be deflected simply by such a constitutional snafu from what she regarded as an otherwise satisfactory proposal.

Too late for poll tax before election

But who would pay? Surely not everyone, no matter how poor. Where would the cut-off be? Would there have to be so many exemptions that the level of payment needed to be quite high in some areas if a poll tax was to replace the domestic rates? The Government would get the worst of both worlds if it was just going to top up the present rating system. There would be the obloquy of introducing a new tax without any credit for getting rid of an old one.

Political opponents would have enormous scope to run scare stories until the new system was actually in operation. The Government could not specify in advance what the poll tax would be because it would have to vary according to each authority's level of expenditure.

Yet it is already too late to have a poll tax in operation before the next general election. The earliest possible timetable would be a consultative document by the end of the year and a commitment to legislate in the Queen's Speech of 1986.

This leaves two alternatives: to legislate before the next election without introducing the new system until after it, or simply to draw up a specific proposal for legislation in the next Parliament. Either way, a poll tax would feature prominently in the election campaign, which would hardly be the best way for the Conservatives to win it. Having a poll tax might solve some of the Government's problems, but getting one would seem likely to create more.

Transport and General ballot

Showdown for former friends

By David Felton, Labour Correspondent

Mr Moss Evans and Mr George Wright, who met this afternoon in the Transport and General Workers' Union headquarters in London for a "showdown" over the balloting controversy, have remarkably similar backgrounds and were close colleagues and friends when they worked together in Birmingham.

Mr Evans, the retiring general secretary, has asked Mr Wright, who was defeated in the election for the succession to provide evidence to support his call for a fresh ballot.

Both men established their union careers in the tough proving ground of the Midlands motor industry. Mr Evans was regional officer in the Midlands when Mr Wright was a conveyor at the Leyland Longbridge factory, but their paths parted when Mr Wright was appointed secretary of the union's Welsh section while Mr Evans became national organizer based at Transport House.

Mr Evans, who went on to become general secretary of the country's largest union, is the son of a miner and one of 12 children, while Mr Wright, one of 10 children is the son of a railway worker. Both men worked in Midlands engineering factories, Mr Evans was first a member of the engineering workers' union.

He joined the transport and general in 1950 and after becoming a shop steward was appointed a fulltime official responsible for the engineering and chemicals industries in Birmingham. Within 10 years he had risen to become a national official with responsibility for engineering. He came to public attention as secretary of the automotive section and chief negotiator at Ford.

Mr Evans was involved in several high-profile strikes at Ford and in the Midlands where he gained a reputation for public oratory which he used to persuade reluctant workers to end lengthy disputes.

From 1973 to 1978 he was the union's national organizer, which placed him at number four in the union hierarchy, the position now held by Mr Ron Todd, victor by almost 45,000 votes in the now disputed election for general secretary. Mr Evans was elected general secretary in 1978 to succeed Mr Jack Jones. In the poll he won a three-to-one majority over Mr John Cousins, son of Frank Cousins, a former general secretary.

Under the union rules Mr Evans could stay in office until he is 65 but he elected to retire after the union's biennial delegate conference in July when he will be 60.

He suffered in the early part of his seven-year term of office from the inevitable comparisons with Jack Jones and he adopted a less autocratic style of leadership.

In that respect Mr Todd could be expected to carry on the tradition, but Mr Wright, who is 49, made clear during his election campaign that he intended to provide leadership which he felt the union lacked in recent years. Although he was supported in the election by centrists and those to the right in the union he holds views firmly identified with the left and is a strong supporter and friend of Mr Neil Kinnock.

Charter airline blames unfair competition

Britannia Airways, Britain's biggest charter airline, which is owned by Thomson, is to cut jobs by 350 this year and blames "unfair competition" by British Airways as the main cause.

Five of the line's 31 Boeing 737s are to be sold, and pilots, cabin staff, and engineers will be affected by reduced recruitment this summer, by early retirement or redundancy, voluntary or otherwise.

Britannia blames the Government for failing to protect the interest of independent charter airlines.

Rail strikes could bring £500,000 damages claim

By Our Labour Correspondent

British Rail said last night that unions could face claims for damages of £500,000 after yesterday's one-day strike which paralysed services in Scotland, and for the 24-hour stoppage in the Midlands and Yorkshire last January.

Union officials have been sceptical of British Rail's willingness to take legal action under the Government's labour laws, but British Rail managers were saying that the unions would be mistaken if they thought that it would shy away from seeking compensation.

Yesterday's strike, which received total support from the National Union of Railwaymen's 12,000 members in Scotland, was called in protest at the prospective loss of 1,250 jobs at the Springburn locomotive works in Glasgow. The union argues that the job cuts are a prelude to closure.

Only one train ran in Scotland. A union official said the "tremendous" support for the strike showed that railway workers understood the union's case over the Springburn works, which is in an area with 36 per cent unemployment.

British Rail estimated that its normal daily revenue in Scotland was about £250,000, exactly the maximum it can claim from the union under the 1982 Employment Act. Any legal moves would initially be brought under last year's Trade Union Act on the grounds that the NUR had lost immunity to civil action because it had not held a ballot of its members.

It issued a statement to "emphasize" that it was still collecting information on the January 17 stoppage by the NUR and the train drivers' union, Aslef, in the East Midlands and South Yorkshire.

Mrs Monica Chatters, aged 39, escaped unhurt after an RAF Hawk trainer ploughed through her cottage's thatched roof and into a field, in Neding Tye, Suffolk yesterday. The pilot had ejected to safety.

Blocked tax deal costs museum £200,000

By Geraldine Norman, Sale Room Correspondent

The National Museum of Wales is buying for about £200,000 two magnificent Flemish portraits about which it had hoped to get for nothing.

The museum joins the list of institutions suffering from the Government's restriction on the acceptance of works of art in lieu of tax. A limit of £1 million for acceptances during 1984-85 was announced at the end of last year. The portraits were offered in payment of transfer tax but turned down.

The portraits, depicting an unknown lady and gentleman against landscape backgrounds, are the work of Marten van Heemskerck. They date from the mid-sixteenth century and are probably the finest Flemish Mannerist portraits in the UK.

They used to belong to the Beit collection and were inherited by the late Mrs Arthur Bull, Sir Alfred Beit's sister. The family loaned them to the National Museum of Wales in Cardiff in 1982 and they have hung there ever since.

The paintings were offered to the nation last year in lieu of tax, with a market valuation of £400,000.

Police seeking second suspect for Brighton bombing

By Stewart Tandler, Crime Reporter

Police investigating the Brighton bombing disclosed yesterday that their main suspect was accompanied by another shadowy person when he stayed in the Grand Hotel three weeks before the Conservative Party conference.

For some time the police have said they want to interview a "Roy Walsh" who stayed in room 629 where the bomb was left. The man was booked in from September 15 to 18. Yesterday, after a Brighton inquest recorded verdicts of unlawful killing on the five people who died when the delayed actin bomb erupted on October 12, Detective Chief Superintendent Jack Reece, of Sussex police, said it appeared Walsh was not alone.

Walsh and the other person were discovered to have eaten lunch together in the hotel's restaurant on September 15. Over the weekend sandwiches and drinks for two were delivered to room 629.

During the inquest Mr Reece told Mr Edward Grace, coroner for the western district of East Sussex, that every guest in rooms 628, 629, 528, 529

Children of divorced make worse parents

By Our Social Services Correspondent

Young children who experience the divorce or separation of their parents are more likely to have poor relationships with their own children according to a study that has followed more than 3,300 children since their birth in 1946.

They are more likely to have undemonstrative relationships with their children by age of four, and are less likely to take them to nurseries or playgroups, take part in imaginative play with them at home or read to them, and tell them stories.

By the age of eight these children were more likely to play with those younger than themselves were likely to be of below average popularity at school, and do worse in tests of verbal ability than children whose mothers said they had warm relationships with their offspring at the age of four.

The findings come from the Medical Research Council's National Survey of Health and Development, started in 1946, which has followed a third of all the children born in Britain in one week in March of that year.

The effects were most marked when divorce or separation came before the child was aged five.

Cheap solar power from Britain

By Pearce Wright, Science Editor

A system invented by a British university research team for converting the sun's energy into electricity, developed by US and Japanese firms, is at last to be made in Britain. Even now, the factory for making solar cells from a material known as amorphous silicon has been built by the American high technology company Chromar Corporation.

The new plant at Bridgend, South Wales, is to produce photovoltaic panels for an international solar energy market that has grown to £240 million a year, and in five years is expected to exceed £800 million. Until the discovery of amorphous silicon, conversion of sunlight to electricity by the photovoltaic process was slow to develop because of the high price of solar cells.

The pioneering work was done by two physicists, Professor Walter Spear and Dr Peter LeCombe, at Dundee University. It opened the way to manufacturing cheap solar cells. Professor Spear said yesterday that the discovery "significantly evoked no interest from British companies or the Government-backed, agency responsible for exploiting university inventions, the National Research and Development Corporation (now part of the British Technology Group). Instead, the idea was taken over by US and Japanese manufacturers."

In the meantime, further research at Dundee has produced advances in amorphous silicon that could cut drastically the cost of electronic memories and other devices associated with developments in microcomputers and robotics.

The material is in a non-crystalline state, whereas the better-known silicon chip is forged from a perfect crystal. The care needed to obtain such process the pure crystalline material imposes severe restrictions in applications such as solar energy.

Amorphous silicon circuits are made in a continuous production process, in which silicon is deposited on a thin strip of foil from a jet of gas.

Damages award for false nude pictures
A former television quiz show hostess, Anthea Redfern, won "substantial" libel damages and costs in the High Court yesterday over nude photographs, said to be of her, in the magazine Club International.

Miss Redfern, aged 33, the former wife of the television entertainer, Bruce Forsyth did not pose for Mr Paul Raymond's magazine in 1983. Her counsel, Mr John Fitzgerald, told Mr Justice Mansfield that the photographs in the "Celebrity Nude Feature" were of someone with a similar facial appearance.

Other pictures of Miss Redfern and Mr Forsyth fully clothed, part of the feature, were included without their knowledge, he said.
Miss Redfern from Warfield, Berkshire, rose to prominence as the hostess in Bruce Forsyth's Generation Game. They divorced in 1982.

Minister eyes drug traffickers' profits

By Peter Evans, Home Affairs Correspondent

New powers to seize profits from drug trafficking are being considered by the Government. They include reversing the burden of proof, as is done in the United States.

That would require a suspect to prove the legitimacy of his or her assets, rather than it having to be shown that they were acquired illegitimately.

Mr David Mellor, Parliamentary Under Secretary of State at the Home Office, who has returned from a visit to the United States to study anti-drug methods, said yesterday: "I find it difficult to think we could make effective progress without reversing the burden of proof." Referring to studies of confiscation, he said at a press briefing: "The difficulty is getting clear rules that the courts can enforce and are effective. We are trying to build on the 1972 criminal bankruptcy arrangements that have not been a great success."

"We are looking at a report of a committee of lawyers and others chaired by Mr Justice Hodgson and commissioned by the Home Office for the Reform. I think we are in the

'Innocent man wrongly jailed for killing'

By Our Social Services Correspondent

A former police officer was jailed for a killing he did not commit, a Manchester Crown Court jury was told yesterday. Noel Fellowes served four years of a seven-year sentence for the manslaughter of an elderly coin dealer who was strangled by bonds used to tie him. That conviction was described in court as a "tragic mistake", because another man had since admitted tying up the coin dealer after a fight.

Mrs Helen Grindrod, QC, for the prosecution alleged that William Clark told detectives: "I am told a man called Fellowes was convicted for this, but he did not have any part in it."

Mr Clark, aged 38, of Openshaw, Manchester, denies the manslaughter of Mr Harold Parkinson, aged 67, who was found dead at his home in Overton, near Morecambe, 15 years ago.

A month after the killing, Mr Fellowes, who is now a successful businessman in Berkshire, was arrested for murder and later convicted of manslaughter. "The Crown now say to you that that was a tragic mistake", Mrs Grindrod told the jury.

The investigation into the killing was reopened last year. Mr Clark, it was alleged, admitted going to Mr Parkinson's home to steal. A fight began when Mr Parkinson surprised him.

The trial continues today.

In February Sir Peter Hall, director of the National Theatre, announced that the Lyceum would close, and the National would make 100 staff redundant, because of the low level of Arts Council grant. ## £937,000 football pools win

Mr Dennis Turner, a factory worker, aged 51, yesterday collected a record £937,807 pools jackpot for a 36p stake.

Mr Turner picked his matches at random. "I tried using the same numbers each week for several years but never came near to winning, and after 25 years of doing the pools this is the first time I've ever won", he said.

After 30 years as a machine operator at a tyre factory, Mr Turner of Smallthorpe, Burslem, Staffordshire will retire.

"Now I can afford to do all the things I've ever wanted to," he said. They included buying a new car, taking a holiday in the US and buying houses for his daughters.

His jackpot came from an 8 from 10 full perm with Littlewoods, winning one first, two third and 14 fifth dividends. He received his cheque at the Hilton Hotel, London, from the actor Howard Keel.

Caterer banned for strike food

Mr Ernest Grosvenor, a caterer, has been barred from catering for a banquet next month for the new Mayor of Chesterfield, because he provided tea and sandwiches for the police during the miners' strike.

Mr Bill Flanagan, the Labour leader of the council, said: "Mr Grosvenor has been blacklisted for feeding policemen drafted into the area to confront strikers during the pits dispute." The council gave £50,000 and other support to strikers' families.

Pensioner fined

Tommy Belfield, aged 70, smashed a glass door with a shillelagh at a wedding reception while trying to stop a fight, magistrates at Reigate, Surrey, were told yesterday. He was fined £100 and ordered to pay compensation of £56 after admitting possessing an offensive weapon and damaging the door.

1984-TWO MILLION NEW INVESTMENT ACCOUNTS

- Growth of 18.7% pushing total assets up close to £17bn
- Reserves up £86m at £618m
- 2 million new investment accounts opened
- Lending 21% up even on the record year in 1983
- Net receipts from investors of £1.5bn
- Liquidity at a level which will provide healthy support for 1985 lending activity
- More than £1 bn of all advances was on pre-1919 property
- Further advances were up 29% at £317m

Among the points made by the Chairman, Sir Campbell Adamson, at the Abbey National Annual General Meeting held on the 17th April, 1985 were:

"Overall, a year of success in attracting investments and a major increase in mortgage lending. All this was achieved against an increasingly volatile interest rate background in the latter part of the year."

"Government moves towards deregulation and fiscal neutrality are also becoming increasingly felt. Recent measures have served to remove many of the differences between banks and building society operations in the personal financial sector, with the result that the intense competition will increase."

"The Green Paper provides a framework for Abbey National to play a greater role in the developing financial scene. But, and I cannot emphasise this too forcefully, our prime aim is to ensure that the needs of our nine million investment account holders and one million borrowers are fully met and additional services will be added with this in mind."

Current Interest Rates
"We are committed to ensuring that our investing members receive as good a deal as with any other financial institution. Because of the general rise in competitive rates recently we have increased our interest rates twice in 1985. Real investment returns from Abbey National are the best ever. We regret that the circumstances have inevitably led to higher mortgage rates."

Investment Limits Removed
"Previous investment limits imposed by the Revenue have been removed. The Society will now accept any amount. In addition to the personal account range, a money market account is available."

Service
"In June, we will introduce the first in a new network of automated teller machines which will provide additional free facilities, day and night. By the end of 1985 we expect to have more than 200 units throughout the country. Not only in our branches but also in other retail outlets. Abbey National is part of a major consortium which will soon have a network of 1,000 machines throughout the country, each of which will be available to our members."

Housing and Mortgage Finance
"Almost £4 bn was advanced to 180,000 borrowers, half of whom were buying for the first time. 93,000 borrowers received further advances to improve their homes. Management and financial resources have been directed into urban renewal and by the end of 1984, over 1,000 housing units had been completed or were under construction by Abbey Housing Association."

"The adoption, by the EEC commission of the draft directive aimed at liberalising mortgage credit, brings us closer to a position whereby we might operate in other European countries as we have been planning to do since the opening of our Brussels office in 1979."

The Green Paper
"While the final shape of the legislation is yet to be decided upon, some of these permissible activities indicate a level of risk somewhat higher than has previously been the case. Involvement in them will depend on the strength of our financial reserves. This will place a premium on establishing realistic operating margins and containing all costs."

Our firm belief is that legislation should recognise the greater capabilities and interests of the major societies by treating them less restrictively than the smaller ones. What we want is the freedom to provide the wide range of personal financial services we think you, our members, have a right to expect. What we shall not lose sight of is that our greatest strength is our membership base and our main task must always be to preserve it."

Letters without a postcode will take longer to deliver from today

By Colin Hughes

Letters which fail to use the full postcode will, for the first time nationally from today, find their passage through the postal system slowed down.

Today's change is the first of two phases which are crucial to increasing Post Office efficiency and profitability.

The greatest impact of the changes in a system where personal mail has declined to one-seventh of the market, will be on bulk and business post.

Phase one, starting national operation today, brings into action all 68 of the 81 projected new district sorting centres, which will use automatic sorting machines for all stages of postal distribution for the first time.

Phase two, which will start nationally in about two years, but is already running at the Mount Pleasant sorting office in London, will almost eliminate human sorting for more than half of the 45 million items a day passing through the Post Office.

Under the first phase, which has already been running at some centres, mail will be gathered into centralized sorting offices, bypassing the old sub-offices, direct from the postbox.

Each item will be fed on to a conveyor-belt passing before a sorting operator, who reads the post-code and translates it into phosphor dots which are punched on to the envelope.

If the sender has included the full code two rows of dots will be punched on to the right-hand side of the envelope. The bottom row refers to the outward part of the code (see insert), the top one to the inward part: the first and second parts of the post-code respectively.

Automatic sorting machines can read either row. At the collection office one machine will read the bottom row, and pack it for road or rail delivery to the right town.

Once it arrives another automatic sorting machine will read the top row, where the crucial second part of the post-code comes into play. That machine will sort the letter into a pile which corresponds directly with the postman's round: the postman "can", in effect, pick up that pile, put it in a postbag, and set off.

At Mount Pleasant sorting office in London, the country's largest, the Post Office now has union agreement to use the next

The complete British post-code, is internationally unusual in narrowing addresses down to tiny areas. On average, the same set of letters and digits is specific to only 15 homes.

Most countries use only "outward" codes, a line of numbers which merely tell the collecting office which town or city distribution centre the mail needs to be sent to.

That function is performed by the first part of the British code. In the code N16 9NB, in London, for example, the initial "N" means that the address is covered by London's northern district sorting office. The number 16 is simply a sub-division, usually where postmen used to pick up sacks for delivery (and often still do). They are based on the former postal districts which covered, say, the parishes which make up a town.

That first block has been in full use since the post-code was introduced. It is the second "inward" part of the code that distinguishes the British system, and is the motor which drives the new sorting technology.

The 9NB in the above example, an incidentally arbitrary arrangement of letters and digits, defines the smallest areas into which a postman's walk can be broken down. A large building receiving mountains of mail has its own postcode, and a close with only three houses would have one code to itself, whereas 20 or 30 houses on a long street might all share a code.

The small units are valuable because they mean that management can easily rearrange a postman's round without altering the codes.

At present 59 per cent of all mailing is fully post-coded by the sender, although the figure is far worse for personal mail than for businesses. The latter can obtain free postcode directories, which fill a small of shelves with all 1.5 million codes, covering the United Kingdom's 22 million addresses.

Others have several ways of finding out their own and other people's codes. Libraries and main post offices keep the directories. Thomson's local directories cover 90 per cent of codes, and Post Office Service listed in Yellow Pages answer specific requests.

centres like Driver and Vehicle Licensing at Swansea, are enormous.

If the Post Office can persuade them to use accurate postcoding on everything their efficiency will be hugely increased.

Since Post Office profits are rising, from £27.1 million in 1981 to £116.9 million last year, largely because of the growth in business mailing enabled by computerization, the efficiency boost is essential for maintaining growth.

Isle of Wight landslip worry

Part of the Isle of Wight faces probably the worst urban landslide danger in Britain, a conference on the island was told yesterday.

Professor John Hutchinson, professor of engineering geology at Imperial College, London, said that Britain lagged far behind other countries in mapping landslide zones.

Professor Hutchinson, who is Britain's foremost authority on landslides, said that while inland areas of Britain might be "geologically quiet", coastal areas, experiencing erosion and prone to landslip, needed a warning system.

He was speaking at a two-day conference on problems associated with the coastline of the Isle of Wight.

presented probably the largest urban landslide problem in Britain, he said.

A period of above average rainfall, related to ground water pressures, could trigger a big landslide at Ventnor, (population 6,000), as occurred after an exceptionally wet year in 1960-61.

He hoped to carry out further studies of Ventnor landslides.

Battle for the counties

Tories campaign on low-rate platform

By Hugh Clayton, Local Government Correspondent

Rate rises not rate reform will be at the heart of the Conservative campaign in the elections on May 2 for all Welsh and most English county councils.

Mr Patrick Jenkin, Secretary of State for the Environment, said yesterday that it was not clear whether the Government would legislate to reform the rates before or after the general election.

"We do not regard the present system as having more than a limited life," he told a campaign press conference in London. "It remains perfectly possible that we will be able to legislate this side of a general election."

Mr Lewis Moss, leader of the majority Conservative group in the Association of County Councils and a former leader of Berkshire County Council, said: "It would be quite premature for us to discuss this issue as candidates on the doorstep."

Ministers made it clear yesterday that the publicity engendered by the Chequers "summit" on the Prime Minister's commitment to rate reform would not be carried forward into their shire campaign.

Candidates would concentrate on the issues of rate rises and the value for money provided by majority groups of different parties.

Mr Jenkin said that rates charged by Conservative county councils had risen by 31 per cent since the last elections four years ago.

The comparable increase for Labour-controlled authorities was 62 per cent, he said. Increases in councils where Alliance councillors had a majority or held the balance of power were half way between the Conservative and Labour figures.

The workforce of Labour-controlled Derbyshire County Council had risen by 2 per cent since the last elections, while that in Conservative-led Lincolnshire had dropped 5 per cent.

Mr Moss said that other parties would base their campaigns on claims that the Conservatives had made damaging cuts in jobs and services. But Labour and Alliance candidates used the word "cuts" to cover "desirable projects of growth which it is not possible to finance immediately."

Mr John Gummer, Conservative party chairman, made it clear that the party would portray the Alliance as a pale version of Labour.

Mr Jenkin made a glancing reference to Conservative complaints, suppressed for the shire election campaign, about the injustice of the Government's system of awarding rate support grant. "The Government is anxious to get rid of the target and penalty regime as soon as may be. We recognize the rough justice of the target system."

Games pirates' promise

Rival computer software manufacturers are to unite in an attempt to seek out and take action against pirates who are costing them millions of pounds a year in lost revenues, the High Court was told yesterday.

But Mr Thomas Beazley, acting for five computer companies, told the Vice-Chancellor, Sir Robert Megarry, that the companies would not be taking any further action against four men after they promised not to pirate again.

The four accused, Wayne Dransfield, Kevin Priestley, Greg Nicholson, and Lee Dunlin, all from Hull, admitted the unauthorized copying and promised that they would obey the judge's order not to do it again. The five companies agreed to drop their claims for damages or costs.

Discovery crew fails in despairing attempt to revive drifting satellite

From Mohsin Ali, Washington

The crew of the space shuttle Discovery yesterday failed to activate a disabled US Navy communications satellite despite valiant efforts.

Dr Rhea Seddon, the only woman in the crew of seven, several times used the shuttle's Canadian-built 50ft robot arm to try to switch a lever on the side of the slowly-spinning satellite.

But she could not push it far enough to bring to life the powerless craft and put it into a permanent orbit 22,300 miles above the earth.

"You did everything you possibly could - great job," Mission Control told the crew, after ordering Discovery to move away from the satellite.

A NASA official said the Discovery was expected to return to the Kennedy Space Centre at Cape Canaveral tomorrow.

The Discovery carried two communications satellites. One for use by Canada, was deployed a few hours after take-off of the space shuttle five-day mission last Friday. The second failed to go into orbit when deployed on Saturday.

The crew yesterday spent more than three hours manoeuvring the shuttle close to the satellite for the bold salvage attempt.

At the end of the shuttle's robot arm was makeshift "fly swatter" fingers attached by astronaut Jeffrey Hoffman and David Griggs during an unheated space walk on Tuesday.

Using a television camera at the end of the arm, Dr Seddon, a physician, pressed the floppy "fingers" against the satellite and tried to flip the small switch. But the delicate operation did not work.

The satellite, called Syncom, should have activated itself on deployment but remains lifeless.

Despite the failure to reactivate the satellite, the Discovery's mission has been a success.

It has made history by taking Senator Jake Garn into space, the first politician to do so. The Republican senator from Utah, has been the subject of medical experiments to test the body's response to weightlessness and nausea in space.

Pretoria's last man pulls out of Angola

Oshikango, Namibia (Reuters) - South Africa yesterday formally withdrew its last soldiers from Angola under a pullout announced on Monday which analysts said was part of a new push for Namibian independence.

A column of about 500 soldiers and 100 vehicles pulled back across the border into Namibia and were received by the South African Defence Force chief General Constand Viljoen.

About 60 South African soldiers remained at Caluque in Angola. Military sources said they were helping to guard the Ruacana-Calueque hydro-electric scheme.

General Viljoen said that a South African-Angolan joint commission which has been monitoring the withdrawal would be wound up within 30 days.

In Cape Town yesterday, President Botha of South Africa met internal Namibian political parties to discuss their plan for an interim government. The parties, grouped into the Multi-Party Conference which excludes Swapo, are suggesting that they should form an interim government themselves and draw up a constitution

10-year undeclared war

South Africa has been fighting an "undeclared war" in Angola since 1975 in support of Unita and the FNLA against the pro-marxist MPLA. Troops penetrated to within sight of Luanda, the capital, but retreated when the US failed to deliver its expected support.

The main events were: Dec 1980: President Eduardo Dos Santos of Angola accuses South Africa of killing 2,000 civilians and inflicting £2.500 million worth of damage in three years.

May 1981: President Reagan wins reversal of a congressional ban on covert US intelligence operations in Angola by promising to aid Namibian independence.

July 1981: The Soviet Union warns the US that Angola's allies will protect its independence.

Sept 1981: South Africa

launches "Operation Protea" with 15,000 troops.

Dec 1981: The Western contact group - the US, Britain, West Germany, France and Canada - established and Dr Chester Crocker, US Under-Secretary of State for African Affairs, begins shuttle diplomacy.

Feb 1982: The "Linkage" issue emerges. Angola and Cuba say that Cuban troops in Angola will be withdrawn once all signs of possible South African invasions cease.

Dec 1982: South African and Angolan ministers meet. Cuban military strength in Angola is reported to have been increased.

Aug 1983: President Dos Santos claims South African air raids increasing.

Feb 1984: South Africa and Angola agree in Lusaka to establish joint monitoring commission to oversee withdrawal of South African troops

French take first step in Star Wars technology

Paris - France yesterday announced a project dubbed Eureka to create a "technological Europe" (Diana Geddes writes).

It will involve research into lasers, particle beams, and large computers, and has clear implications for eventual European participation in President Reagan's Star Wars initiative.

South Sudanese put demands to junta

From Gill Lusk, Khartoum

A grouping of politicians from Sudan's strife-torn south, who expect to provide three ministers for the country's new Government, yesterday made their first official public appearance.

At their first press conference, the Southern Sudanese Political Association put forward a nine-point programme. The main demands were the lifting of Islamic law and reunification of the south into one region as stipulated under the 1972 Addis Ababa agreement that ended the 17-year civil war.

However, the association failed to make any announcement on participation in the Government which representatives of professional associations, trade unions and political parties have been painfully putting together in the 11 days since the overthrow of former President Nimeiry.

Nor did the association put forward detailed proposals for the south. The proposal to lift the harsh and personal brand of Sharia law, that General Nimeiry imposed in September 1983, is similar to one put forward by parties from the mainly Muslim north, including the National Unionist Party. But in the predominantly pagan and Christian south, Sharia provided a major impetus for the guerrilla war being waged by the Sudanese People's Liberation Army.

The issue of the division of the south into three regions, implemented in June 1983, also contributed to the rebellion, while bitterly dividing southerners. Now however, politicians from both sides have joined together in the association to demand a unified south.

Many claim that the association has no mandate to speak for the south or to take part in the new central Government.

The three members whose names have been put forward for ministerial positions are, like many association personalities, all leading politicians and former regional ministers.

Mr Samuel Aru Bol, provisional chairman of the association, Mr Peter Gatkuoth and Mr Albino.

Craxi sets his targets for European union

From Ian Murray, Strasbourg

An intensive round of meetings to discuss European union "at the highest political level" is being planned by Signor Bettino Craxi, the Italian Prime Minister and current President of the European Council.

Signor Craxi made his announcement in Strasbourg yesterday when he "reported" to the European Parliament on the last European summit. Before the Milan summit in June all EEC heads of government will be asked how much they are prepared to support some kind of European union.

The timetable has not yet been drawn up but Signor Craxi means to start his "confessionals" in the margins of the world economic summit in Bonn early next month.

The European Parliament set European union rolling again last year, when it passed a resolution containing a new draft treaty which would all but do away with national vetoes. Yesterday it was clear that the idea has strong support from many British Conservatives.

But British Labour members

Signor Craxi: First meetings in Bonn were solidly opposed to any extension of the EEC.

Mrs Thatcher will be a main target for Signor Craxi's meetings, since Britain is seen as the major opponent to the European union, the Italian Prime Minister favours.

● CASH FOR FILMS: EEC money should be made available to help to finance community cinema and television films, the European Commission agreed in Strasbourg yesterday, suggesting that any film jointly produced by companies from at least three EEC countries should be eligible for a grant

FORD ANNOUNCE THE FIRST DIRECT INJECTION DIESEL IN A VAN.

Don't be deceived by that familiar Transit bonnet line: beneath it lurks an economic miracle.

The first-ever direct injection diesel developed specially for the medium van. Test drive it, and you'll be so impressed by the way the 2.5 litre Di moves you could well miss what doesn't. The fuel gauge.

THE COMPETITION CAN'T COMPETE

Even in mixed driving, semi-laden, Ford calculate a one-tonne Transit Di is capable of 36 mpg.*

Over 25,000 miles - less than a year's driving for many "trunking" vans - such miserly thirst makes the Di about £150 cheaper to run than the next best fuel efficient van on the market.

It really is like having every eighth gallon free. It's also like having your cake and eating it. So simple is the new engine that it cuts overheads as well as consumption: so efficient is it that all the familiar drawbacks of diesel van operation are removed at a stroke.

MORE POWER FROM LESS FUEL

Gone is the glow-plug, the waiting and wondering about ignition. Gone, too, is the ponderous two-stage combustion process of indirect injection, which blows so many unburnt hydrocarbons out through the exhaust and gives diesel its "smelly" reputation.

The development by Ford of "swirl" technology (see diagram) enables faster, more thorough mixing of air with fuel, and their combustion a split-second later in the one place where energy can be translated directly into output. The piston crown.

While the Di sips less than any comparable diesel, it revs more freely and develops maximum torque higher in the power band. At the same time, careful choice of gear ratios means that it drives and accelerates like a petrol engine.

As a result, you feel the benefits in the two places that count most: under your right foot and in your wallet.

AWARD-WINNING ECONOMY

To prove it, we've picked up a Design Council award for an engine that "leads the way in which manufacturers will move in future to improve fuel economy."

WHAT'S A GARAGE?

While the Transit Di is speedy on the road, you'll find that it's no quicker into the garage.

Simple oil and filter changes at 6,000 miles, and major service intervals only at 12,000, make the Di as cheap to run as it is to fuel.

More than £130 million has been invested by Ford in giving the Di its unique blend of economy with performance, so it's hardly surprising the others have some catching up to do.

With fuel the price it is, though, can you afford to wait?

US and Nicaragua war of words

Ortega says the 'mercenaries' will be defeated

From Alan Tomlinson, Managua

President Daniel Ortega has told the Nicaraguan nation that his Sandinista Government will never be coerced by the United States into negotiating with counter-revolutionary forces. In answer to questions from an audience of workers during a television "Face the People" meeting, he dismissed President Reagan's Nicaraguan peace plan as "an ultimatum which proposes that we go down on our knees so that they can put in the knife. In this case, we prefer to die on our feet."

Mr Reagan's plan links a call on the Sandinistas to negotiate new elections with the anti-government contras with a promise to the US Congress that, if it approves the President's request for $14 million (£11 million) of renewed covert aid, the money will not be spent on arms unless the government here fails to make significant concessions within 60 days of the start of talks.

President Ortega said the contras were fighters who had become instruments of US policy against Nicaragua. "These mercenary forces have no future, they will be defeated," he said. Mr Reagan wanted a ceasefire because they were being pushed back into their bases in Honduras and needed a breathing space.

It was not the money which was important, he said, since the Central Intelligence Agency had continued to channel more than $14 million to the contras despite the suspension of covert-aid by Congress last June. What was really at stake was Congressional approval of President Reagan's political conduct.

Senator Ortega said he had told

American senators and congressmen who had visited Nicaragua recently that a vote against renewed aid would open the possibility of a negotiated solution to the conflict, a vote in favour would only lead to the deaths of more innocent people.

Privately, the Nicaraguan president has told foreign journalists that he would feel "morally obliged" to make new peace concessions if Congress rejected the aid request.

However, in an interview, the Foreign Minister, Father Miguel D'Escoto, ruled out the possibility that these might include opening negotiations with the contras. "What is the function of talking to hirelings who can be replaced by those who hire them?" he said.

Nicaragua has asked the US to reopen the talks in Mexico, which were abruptly broken off in January.

Senator Ortega and Father D'Escoto have met six congressional delegations which have visited Managua since Easter including influential members of the intelligence sub-committees of both the Senate and the House of Representatives.

Among them was Admiral Stansfield Turner, director of the CIA in the Carter Administration, who synthesized some of the concerns troubling Congressmen.

"Covert action is an instrument of foreign policy, not an instrument of intelligence. Intelligence is collecting information, covert action is trying to influence events secretly. In a democracy such as ours, when foreign policy is carried out secretly, there are risks," he said.

Leak report will stir up Congress

From Christopher Thomas, Washington

Although beset by congressional opposition, President Reagan is seeking the expansion and strengthening of the 15,000-strong guerrilla army fighting the Sandinista government of Nicaragua.

Direct United States military force, although ruled out for now, is "an eventual option," according to a confidential White House report leaked yesterday.

The idea of direct American intervention in Nicaragua has never seriously been mooted by the White House, Congress, in any case, would almost certainly vigorously oppose an intervention under existing circumstances.

The language of the White House document, headed "top secret" and distributed to selected congressmen, seems tailored to raise the temperature of the debate.

The report, headed "US Support for the Democratic Resistance Movement in Nicaragua," said the President's objective in seeking a resumption of US aid to the Honduras-based guerrillas was to create real pressure on the government of Nicaragua.

It spoke in terms of creating a guerrilla force in the north, obviously meaning Honduras - of 20,000 to 25,000, and a force in the south on the Costa Rican border of 5,000. The northern force is now estimated at 15,000 men. The southern force is about 5,000.

The White House report, leaked to the New York Times, was sent to two congressional committees on April 3. It argued that the alternative to assisting the rebels was an expensive and doubtful strategy of containment.

Into battle: Miskito Indian guerrillas take to the water in their fight against the Nicaragua Government. The Miskitos, striving to preserve their traditional lifestyle, operate from bases in Honduras and Costa Rica.

"The containment approach is obviously deficient in that it is passive and does not contemplate changes in Sandinista behaviour," it stated. "Only major direct pressure can induce change."

President Reagan has been advised by Republican leaders

Weizman confident of prospects for Egypt-Israel summit

From Our Correspondent, Cairo

Mr Ezer Weizman, whose visit to Cairo caused an Israeli Cabinet crisis, is optimistic about prospects for an early summit meeting between President Hosni Mubarak of Egypt and Mr Shimon Peres, the Israeli Prime Minister.

He said after discussions yesterday with the Egyptian Foreign Minister, Mr Esmat Abdel-Maguid: "I am... now more optimistic about the future."

Mr Weizman, Israeli Minister without Portfolio, spoke as Mr Richard Murphy, the US deputy secretary for Middle East affairs, flew into Cairo to discuss a possible US role in an Egyptian initiative calling for direct talks between Israel and a Jordanian-Palestinian delegation on the Palestinian problem. He has been in Jerusalem recently.

Mr Weizman's discussions in Egypt appear to have made Israeli officials confident enough to predict a summit within weeks.

He spoke with President Mubarak for two hours on Tuesday and then said that with "a lot of preparations beforehand," the meeting would be forthcoming shortly.

His predictions were echoed yesterday by Israeli officials accompanying his three-day visit, while Jerusalem officials said the summit - which would be the first meeting between Egypt and Israel in four years - would take place next month. They said it had been agreed in a letter to Mr Peres from President Mubarak last week.

There has been a recent thaw in what is often described as the "cold peace" between Egypt and Israel, but Egypt is reluctant to rush into a summit without a great deal of preparation.

President Mubarak's chief political adviser, Mr Osama el Baz, said: "What counts is whether such a meeting would realize the general national interest, and when we talk about that we are not only talking about Egypt's national interest but the interest of the Arab position generally."

His remarks seem to imply that Egypt intends first to tackle stumbling blocks.

These include the issue of the border area of Tabá, in Sinai, which is claimed by both countries, a complete Israeli withdrawal from southern Lebanon, and a genuine movement towards solving the Palestinian problem.

After his discussions in Egypt, Mr Weizman may feel confident that he can persuade his own divided coalition Cabinet that these problems can be overcome in time for a summit next month.

It is unlikely, however, that Egypt will be bulldozed into a meeting at leader level without what they consider a satisfactory outcome on these issues.

Russian pledge after killing of major

From Our Correspondent, Washington

The Soviet Union has promised that it will not permit use of force or weapons against members of the American military liaison mission, in East Germany, in future, after talks with the US about the recent killing of American Major Arthur Nicholson by a Soviet soldier.

The State Department said the agreement was obtained by the US at a meeting between General Glenn Otis, Commander-in-Chief, US Army Europe, and General Mikhail Zaytsev, Commander-in-Chief, Soviet Forces in East Germany, in Potsdam last Friday.

The Soviet side also agreed to "refer our demand for an apology and compensation to the Nicholson family to higher authorities," the State Department said. The US condemned the killing three weeks ago and lodged strong protests.

A State Department spokesman said yesterday it was too early to judge the results of Friday's meeting but that discussions would continue on ways of preventing Nicholson-type incidents.

Hanoi troops stay on

Jakarta - The Vietnamese Defence Minister, Mr Van Tien Dung, left Indonesia yesterday after a controversial six-day visit with the message that Vietnam has no intention of withdrawing from Cambodia until the Heng Samrin Government can "take care of itself" (Our Correspondent writes).

Nevertheless, the Indonesian Armed Forces chief, General Benny Murdani, said after talks with Mr Dung that he believed Hanoi was withdrawing, not simply rotating, some of its troops in Cambodia.

The visit, which has coincided with increased Vietnamese attacks on the Thai-Cambodian border and Hanoi's celebrations of the downfall of Saigon 10 years ago, has caused concern in Thailand and among Indonesia's other allies.

Greece moves to June poll as Papandreou gets Cabinet support

From Mario Modiano, Athens

Greece will have a general election on June 2 or 9 if its new President, Mr Christos Sartzetakis, grants the Government's request for an early poll which came from a special Cabinet meeting yesterday.

When the request for a June election was made by Mr Andreas Papandreou, the Greek Prime Minister, two weeks ago, President Sartzetakis reserved his reply.

The Greek constitution allows the date of an election - the next should be due in October - to be advanced if a government invokes the need to renew its mandate to tackle an important national issue. The Cyprus crisis, a handy issue in such cases, was cited by Mr Papandreou.

The reason his request has had to be endorsed on the authority of a written Cabinet proposal remains unclear. But President Sartzetakis, a former judge, is known to be strict on the letter of the law, and Cyprus is no more critically troublesome today than for some time.

It may be significant that the Cabinet proposal invokes an additional reason: the need for speedy completion of procedure to amend the constitution. Amendments in hand which strip the President of many of his executive prerogatives go into effect only after endorsement by the next parliament.

The conservative New Democracy opposition party has criticized the government sharply for having failed to commit itself to an early election date.

Mr Papandreou said after yesterday's cabinet meeting that he would ask the President to dissolve Parliament as soon as the constitutional reforms were given a second reading between May 6 and 8. "Elections could then be held in the first half of June," he said. Greek elections must be held on a Sunday.

President Sartzetakis, whose election is still contested by New Democracy, came under strong opposition fire for impromptu remarks during a Greek Easter tour of military units.

The Greeks, he said, unlike Anglo-Saxons, Slavs or Arabs, were a "brotherless people" who thus had to rely primarily on their own forces.

Opposition critics deplored the statement which, they said, echoed the socialist Government's "third-world isolationism". Albania, they said, fed its people comparable propaganda.

Judge asks Bhopal firm to aid victims

From Trevor Fishlock, New York

Union Carbide has been asked by a judge to make an emergency payment of between $5 million (£3.9 million) and $10 million to victims of the Bhopal gas disaster "as a matter of fundamental human decency."

Judge John Keenan, conducting preliminary hearings in a federal court in New York, also ordered funding lawyers to sort themselves out.

He said the company could provide interim relief payments without admitting liability. "If the reports I've read are true, the situation there is still critical."

The judge is trying to bring order to the confusion created by the plethora of lawsuits stemming from the disaster. He is also trying to end the squabbling among the numerous lawyers seeking a part in the litigation and a share of the huge fees at stake.

The lawyers have filed suits in various parts of the United States on behalf of disaster victims, asking for billions of dollars in damages.

They have split into three main groups, vying for the right to represent victims and holding different views on the way litigation should proceed.

Judge Keenan ordered them to select two members of a three-man committee to co-ordinate the lawsuits.

Tragedy aftermath: Mr Damodar Airan, representing Bhopal victims, speaking to the press in New York. Yesterday a judge said Union Carbide could make an emergency relief payment without admitting liability.

France hardens attitude to Unesco and backs reforms

From Diana Geddes, Paris

A marked hardening of France's attitude towards the crisis-ridden Unesco has been confirmed by M Roland Dumas, the French Foreign Secretary, in a speech in Paris to the French national committee on Unesco.

Until now, France has always appeared in public to be the odd man out among the Western nations in tempering its criticism of Unesco's management and policies, and in giving support to its beleaguered Director-General Mr Amadou Mahtar M'Bow.

In his speech on Tuesday M Dumas spoke openly for the first time about the need for Unesco to pursue its proper goals and "to make a constant effort to achieve ideological neutrality... [in order to] avoid a politicization of discussions which, as the present crisis shows, can only lead to confusion, perhaps even to the disappearance of the organization."

The speedy introduction of a reform plan which would satisfy the anxieties of different member states was indispensable to the organization's survival, France shared most of those anxieties, he said. It was now up to the Director-General to draw up such a plan with a calendar for its implementation.

At the last Unesco executive board meeting in Paris in February, France announced that it would provide an extra

$2 million (£1.57m) towards the $28 million which needs to be found this year to make up for the loss of income due to the US withdrawal from the organization, if substantial cuts in programmes are to be avoided. All the other Western nations insisted that they would not contribute more.

Last month France said that the payment of its extra $2 million depended on the presentation of a proper reform plan.

Commenting on the conditions attached to that contribution, M Dumas said that France would be "particularly vigilant about the implementation of the decisions taken".

100 more are arrested in Queensland union row

Brisbane (Reuters) - More than 100 people were arrested yesterday as protest mounted over new anti-strike laws in Australia's northern state of Queensland.

Among them were leading electrical union officials and clergymen from three denominations who are members of the Concerned Christians group.

The latest figure took to more than 200 the number of people arrested for illegal picketing. Commercial transport unions in New South Wales and Victoria began a road blockade of Queensland over the legislation, which was passed in response to a power workers' strike in February. Other unions will start a 24-hour road, air, sea and rail blockade from mid-night tonight.

The Australian Council of Trade Unions has urged industrial bans on 51 companies linked with Queensland's Confederation of Industry.

Queensland's Premier, Sir Joh Bjelke-Petersen, has said he will not repeal the legislation, which bans strikes in the power industry, or reinstate 950 sacked power workers. Their dismissal prompted a dispute which blacked out homes and businesses.

Thatcher praises Banda

By Henry Stanhope, Diplomatic Correspondent

Mrs Margaret Thatcher congratulated President Hastings Banda on agricultural development in Malawi when they met at Downing Street yesterday. She said the country was a model for the rest of Africa.

The Prime Minister also told President Banda, who is thought to be aged 87, how much she had enjoyed his speech at the state banquet in Windsor Castle on Tuesday, during 2½ hours of discussions which lasted over lunch at Number Ten.

The Queen has also praised Malawi's farming achievements, which have enabled the country to feed itself and even act as a granary for neighbouring states.

Earlier the President, who is on a four-day state visit to Britain, met ambassadors and high commissioners at a reception in Windsor Castle. After leaving Downing Street he laid a wreath on the tomb of the Unknown Warrior at Westminster Abbey and last night attended a banquet held by the Lord Mayor of London at Guildhall.

Gibraltar chief heads for Spain

From Our Correspondent, Gibraltar

Sir Joshua Hassan, Chief Minister of Gibraltar, will visit Spain today for the first time in more than 20 years. He had refused to cross into Spain since November 1, 1964, when Spain imposed restrictions on the colony.

Sir Joshua is returning a recent official visit from Señor Rafael Palomino, president of the Mancomunidad, an organization linking seven towns and a population of 230,000 in the adjoining Campo area.

The meeting, in Algeciras, will concentrate on developing tourism in Gibraltar bay, but it is the Chief Minister's visit which is important.

Schör Palomino says it is "bringing to a close the transition towards normality".

Yet Señor Palomino, hopeful that Campo towns will benefit from tourism passing through to the dock, is realistic about what benefits an area of Spain with almost a third of the mainly agricultural workforce unemployed can expect from a population of 26,000.

The Star Wars debate

US drops deadline for joining defence work

From Rodney Cowton, Defence Correspondent, Oslo

The United States has withdrawn the 60-day deadline within which it invited the European members of Nato and some other countries to indicate whether they wished to participate in the $26 billion (£20.4 billion) American "Star Wars" defence research programme.

While visiting Oslo this week Lord Carrington, Secretary-General of Nato, indicated that there would be more flexibility over timing than that deadline implied. It is understood that Mr Caspar Weinberger, the US Defence Secretary, has written to the governments concerned indicating that the deadline was not to be interpreted literally.

The move has been widely welcomed because the original imposition of the deadline was seen in Europe as an unsatisfactory way to deal with allies.

Lord Carrington is understood to be seeking a joint response by the four largest industrial European members of Nato, Britain, West Germany, France and Italy, to the suggestion that they should become involved in the US programme. There are, however, doubts whether agreement can be reached.

Lord Carrington is understood to be arguing that it is only through a co-ordinated response that European members of Nato can hope to maximize the advantages

Among aspects of the programme which the US is said to have suggested as offering possibilities for European involvement, are data processing, rocket propulsion systems and the shorter range weapons

Weinberger's letter

The following is the text of Mr Weinberger's original letter to Nato Ministers of Defence as well as Japan, Australia and Israel, details of which were announced on March 26.

In the period since President Reagan introduced his vision for Strategic Defense Initiative (SDI), many of our Allies have informally expressed an interest in participating in this research program. At the same time, some of our friends have sought clarification of our policy and attitude toward such cooperation. I am writing to you today both to make clear my Government's views on this important subject and to begin a direct dialogue with you thereon.

As you know, the purpose of the SDI is to determine whether there are cost-effective defensive technologies that could enhance deterrence and increase stability. Because our security is inextricably linked to that of our friends and Allies, we will work closely over the next several years with our Allies to ensure that in the event of any future decision to deploy defensive systems (a decision in which consultation with our Allies would play an important part), Allied, as well as US, security against aggression would be enhanced. Moreover, the SDI program will not confine itself solely to an exploitation of technologies with potential against ICBMs, and SLBMs, but will also carefully examine technologies with potential against shorter-range ballistic missiles.

The US will, consistent with our existing international obligations including the ABM Treaty, proceed with cooperative research with the Allies in areas of technology that could contribute to the SDI program. Pursuant to this policy, the US is permitted - and is prepared - to undertake such cooperative programs on data and technology short of ABM component level as may be mutually agreed with Allied countries.

If your nation is interested in exploring possible cooperative efforts or contributions, I would ask, as a first step, that you send me, within 60 days, an indication of your interest in participating in the SDI research program and the areas of your country's research promising for this program. In order to provide a more comprehensive basis for your assessment of pertinent capabilities and to help expedite the process, the US is Washington so that your government's scientific/technical representatives may receive detailed briefings on the SDI program during this period.

We would expect to give your response prompt consideration with a view to initiating as appropriate bilateral discussions on specific areas and arrangements for cooperation.

Troops enforce curfew as nine die in Gujarat caste troubles

From Michael Hamlyn
Delhi

With soldiers in olive green uniforms patrolling the streets and an indefinite curfew in the old city of Ahmedabad, capital of Gujarat, a tense calm has descended after a spate of violence in which nine died.

More than 30 people have lost their lives in troubles which have set caste against caste, Hindu against Muslim, and untouchable or tribal against the rest.

The agitation, which has lasted more than a month, was sparked by a plan to create more reserved places at university and in government employment for so-called backward castes.

Reserved places, an emphatic form of reverse discrimination, is an article of faith in Indian society, sanctified by the constitution and endorsed by the Indian leader from Mahatma Gandhi onwards - particularly by Mahatma Gandhi.

In Gujarat and in most other states, however, the policy has been applied only to the Untouchables, whom Gandhi called Harijans (God's people), and tribal inhabitants who for euphony's sake and because they tend to live in remote hill districts are often called girjans (hill people).

One so-called reservation crisis has arisen since the Chief Minister of Gujarat announced that the policy would apply not only to Harijans and girjans but also to the backward castes.

He ruled that they would qualify for reserved places not by virtue of income but simply by virtue of their caste.

His move was made presumably for electoral reasons, since he did it just before December's general election, after having sat on a report on the subject for 18 months.

The decision has infuriated

the "forward castes" who find their opportunity for further education or for government employment cut by a further 28 per cent. Many students simply took to the streets to protest.

The protests were badly handled by the Gujarat administration, which yielded too late by allowing that reservation would be postponed for a year while everyone thought about it. Now the agitators, the bit between their teeth, are seeking an end to reserved places altogether.

The backward castes are upset about the postponement. The Harijans are furious at what they see as an attack on their position.

And, not unnaturally in such circumstances, as community feelings arise everybody starts to take it out on the Muslims, who until now had been keeping their heads down and letting the Hindus fight it out among themselves.

Ahmedabad, centre of India's cotton industry, which was the focus of Gandhi's first campaign against the British, is now in the forefront of anti-Gandhian intolerance.

A cartoon in a weekly magazine here shows the state's rejection of Gandhism by depicting a huge bare foot crushing a pair of Gandhi-style spectacles.

The Indian Prime Minister, Mr Rajiv Gandhi, has not played this crisis well, appearing to encourage the agitators by saying that the whole reservation policy needs further examination.

He has now reacted firmly, however, by flying his Home Secretary, Mr R D Pradhan, to Gujarat, and by sending six companies of paramilitary police reservists to help keep order.

Karachi bus death riots

Karachi (Reuters) - Nine people were shot dead when police fired on crowds protesting after a girl student was knocked down by a minibus and killed, according to doctors at a government hospital.

At least 100 others have been treated for wounds from bullets, pellets and teargas. City officials imposed a curfew on five areas of Karachi after troops failed to control the protesters.

Most of the victims died on Tuesday and yesterday, the doctors said. Female students launched the protest on Monday after Miss Bushra Zaidi, aged 20, was killed.

More than 3,000 youths protested by setting fire to at least 40 buses, trucks and other vehicles. Police said 200 vehicles and seven banks were damaged and dozens of shops looted.

Deng sees Cambodia as top obstacle

From Mary Lee, Peking

China's top leader, Deng Xiaoping, yesterday called on the Soviet Union to remove the easiest of three obstacles blocking normalization of Sino-Soviet relations which he named as Moscow's support for Vietnam's occupation of Cambodia.

The official Xinhua News Agency quoted Deng as saying: "It was too difficult for the Soviet Union to solve all three problems [Cambodia, Afghanistan and Soviet forces stationed along the border with China] at once. We think these things could be done by starting with one of the obstacles."

Mr Deng, who was speaking to Belgian reporters before meeting the Belgian Prime Minister, Mr Wilfried Martens, said the easiest would be for the Soviet Union to encourage Vietnam to withdraw its troops from Cambodia.

According to Xinhua, Mr Deng said this would be a sensible course as it would not harm the Soviet Union.

A Western diplomat said it was significant that, while the sixth round of normalization talks were in progress in Moscow, Mr Deng should suggest in public which of the obstacles the Soviet Union should try to remove first. Peking is putting pressure on Vietnam via Moscow, the diplomat said. The "Deng initiative" indicates China's recognition that Moscow could be made if Moscow could show it really wanted relations to move forward.

Buy British Tebbit tells Japanese

Tokyo (AP) - The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, Mr Norman Tebbit, met the Japanese Foreign Minister, Mr Shintaro Abe yesterday and asked Japan to take into consideration the European Community's demands that it open up its markets.

A Foreign Ministry official quoted Mr Tebbit as saying he understood that Japan was working to settle trade friction with the United States, but some EEC nations were concerned that their requests might be ignored.

Mr Abe told Mr Tebbit that Japan took the EEC and Asian nations into consideration when it drew up its new market-opening package, the official said.

Earlier, Mr Tebbit met three other Cabinet ministers.

Mr Tebbit, who arrived in Tokyo on Monday, told Mr Keijiro Murata, the Minister of International Trade and Industry, that Britain wants to sell airbuses and defence equipment to reduce the British deficit in trade with Japan. Japan had a $2.4 billion trade surplus with Britain in 1984.

Mr Tebbit also said British banks were interested in doing business in Japan. Mr Murata told Mr Tebbit that private firms would decide on purchases of airbuses.

Atrocities in Guatemala Holy Week of shame and death

From John Carlin, Mexico City

Guatemala remains Central America's most sinister nation in spite of official claims that, with presidential elections due this year, full democracy is only just around the corner.

Whatever the international pressures on its military leaders, the sufferings of its people continue.

Last week there were rumours of a coup against General Oscar Mejia Victores, who came to power in a coup against another general 18 months ago.

But the Roman Catholic Church knows as well as anyone that a coup in Guatemala means no more than a military reshuffle, absolute consensus existing among the officer corps that brutal anti-communism should be the beginning and end of army ideology.

"The future of the country, is dark and uncertain", said the Archbishop of Guatemala City last week. Archbishop Próspero Penados was speaking from the altar at the end of what he described as "a Holy Week of sorrow, shame and death".

At dawn on Maundy Thursday, April 4, lying at the bottom of a ravine just outside the capital, were found the asphyxiated bodies of Señora Rosario Godoy, aged 24, her son, aged two, and her younger brother.

Señora Godoy was the vice-president and founder-member of Mutual Support Group, an organization of relatives of people who have "disappeared" in Guatemala, abducted, they are convinced, by the security forces.

Señora Godoy's husband, Carlos, a university student, was kidnapped by the Security Forces last May. Nothing has been heard of him since.

Initially Mutual Support consisted of the families of 10 disappeared people. Today it has grown to 620 families, fearfully publicising their grief, to the increasing irritation of the military.

On March 15 General Mejia declared Mutual Support a "subversive" group supported by left-wing guerrillas. A few days later threats started to arrive at the homes of Mutual Support leaders.

The body of one of them, Señora Héctor Gómez, was found on March 31. His tongue and teeth had been wrenched out - a message, explained the Mexico-based Guatemalan Commission for Human Rights, warning Mutual Support "to stop talking".

Also on March 31, unaware of Señora Gómez's killing, Señora Godoy wrote a letter to her mother-in-law in Costa Rica, a copy of which has been obtained by The Times.

She wrote that she had been threatened by the Government. "I am going crazy. I wish this nightmare had never begun. I look at Augusto [her now murdered son] and I become more desperate as I see his little eyes screaming at me to give him a peaceful, happy home..."

The Guatemalan Human Rights Commission says at least 32 people were murdered, five of them children, and 12 "disappeared" between March 27 and April 9.

Since a CIA-organized coup in 1954 installed the military in power in Guatemala, international human rights groups believe more than 100,000 Guatemalans have either disappeared or have been the victims of political murder.

● GUATEMALA CITY: The Guatemalan military regime, facing political and economic difficulties, has received backing from the United States embassy, (AFP reports).

The embassy said the US State Department supported Guatemala's steps towards democracy, as well as "any other measures" appropriate to improving the economic situation so that a civilian administration could inherit a solvent economy.

Missing boy led into Paris male prostitution

From Diana Geddes
Paris

The discovery of a 14-year-old runaway schoolboy, drugged and working as a prostitute in one of the well-known red-light districts of Paris, has intensified the fears of thousands of parents whose children similarly disappear from home every year, some never to return.

Thierry, who lived with his father and stepmother in Montmartre, ran away last January with just a few francs in his pocket. In February he turned up in Marseilles, where he met a man who led Thierry into prostitution. He was said to have given the boy powerful doses of tranquilizers every day to keep him docile.

Last week in Paris Thierry was spotted, by a social worker who specializes in juvenile prostitution, in a district near the Opera well known for male prostitution. He was allegedly handing over to M Daniel Passalacqua, aged 28, a father of two, a sum of money he had just received from a client. The police were called, and M Passalacqua arrested.

In an interview published yesterday, Thierry's father, an unemployed sales representative, said: "For two months, I looked everywhere for my son. I thought of a thousand things that might have happened to him, but I hardly thought of homosexual prostitution. Thierry never had any inclination in that direction." He said he had been helped in his search by M Joel Weiss, the social worker who finally found his son. "He took me to some incredible places. I visited establishments where clients openly bought children of their choice from the hotel managers. I ask myself how such things can still go on."

In 1982, the latest year for which records are available, more than 13,000 children, aged between 13 and 16, disappeared from their homes in France. Sixty per cent returned within 48 hours, and a further 30 per cent turned up within 10 days. But 2,332 were never seen again.

According to police, only a small number will have suffered the same fate as Thierry. But M Weiss, who is compiling a dossier on the bars and hotels in an around Paris which deal in juvenile prostitution, estimates that there are more than 5,000 children under the age of 18 who are working as prostitutes in the greater Paris area.

Throughout London, hundreds of local organisations believe that they will suffer if the GLC is abolished, that the services they provide will be severely reduced, and that many of them will disappear.

They all do vital work within their communities. That is why the GLC and the London Boroughs give them grants. Abolition of the GLC will remove the largest source of community funding in the capital.

Local organisations, like many Londoners, made their views known to Whitehall, but, so far, to little effect.

These organisations believe that they are in jeopardy. If you are concerned about this, you can ask your M.P. to raise the issue in Parliament. London cannot afford to say goodbye to all this.

The unbridled King of the Turf

The Times Profile: Lester Piggott

Wonder boy Piggott at 14

There have been four unquestionably great jockeys riding on the English Turf in the last hundred years and more: Fred Archer, Steve Donoghue, Sir Gordon Richards - and Lester Piggott who has dominated the Flat for a generation. Many good judges would say that he is the greatest of all. The season which has just begun is his thirty-eighth and, almost certainly his last.

It has to be "almost" since nothing about Lester Keith Piggott is ever quite certain. This year the master of suspense kept them waiting again. He did not turn up to add his usual extra frisson to the first meeting of the season at Doncaster, lingering instead in the southern hemisphere where he rides in the winters. But as the season gets into its stride with the important meetings at Newmarket and Newbury, it promises to be as fascinating as any in his career.

There are not many records set by those other great jockeys left for him to break. He might conceivably be in the hunt for the jockey's championship which he held for eight years. He would surely, dearly, love to set one last record being broken in turn by winning a tenth Derby at Epsom on June 5. And he starts the season with his life - not for the first time but more than ever - surrounded by mystery and even a whiff of scandal.

He burst upon the racing world as a child wonder, well before most of the jockeys he now rides against were born. Strictly speaking, it was even before he was in his teens. His first winner was at Haydock Park in 1948 when not yet 13. Within a few years, he had put a couple of apprentice championships behind him and was in the front flight of English jockeys. He was second in the Derby at 16 and two years later, in 1954, on Never Say Die, he first won the race which has since been a focal point in his astonishing career.

As an adolescent he already showed the characteristics by which he would dominate racing season after season. He is a horseman of genius, with an empathetic feel for the horse and a brilliant judge of pace and of timing - in the days before starting stalls he was probably the best rider ever seen at the start. He can time a run to perfection, nursing a horse beyond its true distance; or he can masterfully "wait in front", toying with a field behind him. He is immensely strong in a finish, not least because he is much bigger than most Flat jockeys.

These are the qualities which have brought him his championships and his almost certainly unbeaten record of 28 seasons in the English classics. They are believed to have made him the richest English sportsman ever. Golfers, footballers, cricketers can make ter of the training of the 1855 Derby. It is a remarkable pedigree. His obduracy was on display early in his career when he rode Never Say Die again at Ascot a fortnight after the Derby and was stood down for the rest of the season by the Jockey Club men who have hoped to knock some sense and some respect for others into the boy. How far they succeeded is still a matter for debate. He has had numberless brushes with authority since. Nothing has much changed his ferocious determination to go for a gap, even if small and diminishing, to push a third horse with terrible fervour in the last yards of a race.

He is notoriously solitary and withdrawn, partly because he is rather deaf and has a speech impediment. He doesn't give his heart to men or women, owners or trainers. Most of his professional relationships have been tense.

For a decade he was stable jockey to Sir Noel Murless and rode two Derby winners for him, Crepello and St Paddy. But the two men came to a sour parting of the ways. Then in the 1970s he enjoyed a remarkable partnership with the Irish trainer Vincent O'Brien, winning four Derbys for him on Sir Ivor, Nijinsky, Roberto and The Minstrel. That connection came to an abrupt and apparently rocky end also, though some say there was and still is more to it than meets the eye. Then came the years with Henry Cecil.

A racegoer could almost guess Piggott's attitude to trainers and owners from his attitude to the fans. He has almost never been known to respond to the shouts of encouragement as he rides to the start, or the cheers as he unsaddles a winner. He sits stony-faced, win or lose, a seller at Brighton or a classic. Once he rode a particularly brilliant race on a well-backed favourite. Back in the enclosure in front of a cheering crowd, his features were as impassive as ever. The beaming trainer told Piggott he might at least give the punters a smile. "Why should I? If I'd lost they'd be throwing things at me."

On other occasions the crowd has been less than enthusiastic about his victories. Rarely has a Derby winner been so silently greeted as when Piggott won on Roberto in 1972. The jockey engaged to ride him was the much-liked Bill Williamson. He was, however, told near the last moment that he would not ride. Piggott was generally held to have engineered this though, in fact, the decision was Vincent O'Brien's. Not that Piggott would ever hesitate to accept a promising ride in whatever the circumstances. And the cynical racegoer will say that ruthlessness was rewarded.

Lester Piggott relaxes off the course: a racing superstar shrouded in mystery

Almost no jockey alive - perhaps none at all - could have ridden the finish that Lester rode to win that race on Roberto. Good judges agree that if the jockey on the two-neck-and-neck horses had been switched, so would the result. On top of a good horse, Lester Piggott is a very valuable commodity indeed. Jockey's financial arrangements are covered by grave regulations. They are meant to be paid a fixed fee per race (though it can be increased) and a "present" for winning. Any fee they receive as retainer from the stables they race for is supposed to be registered with Weatherbys, the Jockey Club's secretariat. It may be supposed that breaches of these rules have often taken place in the past and been winked at. They can never have been so flagrant as Lester Piggott's "special relationship" with Henry Cecil and his owners. Rumours had been circulating for some time of a highly unorthodox arrangement before the story broke six weeks ago. In fact, Cecil had been writing to his owners explaining an "additional" annual retainer to Piggott of £45,000 and, more remarkably, a guarantee that the jockey should receive a share in any colt on which he won in a big race. That is not a trifle. A share - one-fortieth - of a Derby-winning horse retainer to stud is worth anything upwards of £500,000. Of course, genius dictates its own terms in many fields besides racing, and this was not the first time that such doctored have been given. What was truly remarkable was Mr Cecil's naivety in putting it in writing in envelopes marked "strictly private and confidential", along with a request that the letter should be destroyed. Some might use an even stronger word than naive. Piggott has come through plenty of scrapes before, and will very likely come through this one. As even those who don't adore him admit it would be said if the affair closed his last season in the saddle. He will be 50 in November. All his life, race-riding has meant for him an exhausting battle, to keep his weight down, as it did also Fred Archer - who killed himself a hundred years ago in a fit of depression brought on by racing. Unlike him, Lester is not a depressive, just an introvert. All the same he will welcome the opportunity to put on a healthy stone and see the cranes in his face fill out. He has been preparing for some time to take up his second career as a trainer at the Epsom stables in Newmarket which he owns. Despite the vast sums of money nowadays floating around the world of top-class bloodstock, it may be that he has held back from the transfer just because he earns so much as a jockey.

"You make a hell of a lot more riding than training nowadays", his old gaffer Sir Noel says. Even a genius in the yard could scarcely expect to turn out Derby winners in his first flat season, and as Piggott knows better than most, Derby winners and the like are what brings in the real money.

Not many Flat-race jockeys have made a go of it as trainers. Piggott has one inestimable advantage: a close group of rich connections. Mr Robert Sangster, the McKinnon brothers, and Mr Charles St George. At present Mr St George's horses are trained by Henry Cecil. One of them, Lanfranco, is winter favourite for the Derby. Cecil's present retained jockey is the young American Steve Cauthen. He ought to ride the horse at Epsom; but then that is what Bill Williamson thought 13 years ago.

One career is ending for Piggott, another beginning. And rumour and intrigue, high finance, international owners and astronomical stables fees. It sounds a perfect plot for our greatest thriller writers - and who should be writing Piggott's biography to be published when he retires from the saddle but Dick Francis?

Power to the people of the twilight world

in which they live or work as well as commissioning, and designing a scheme with help from a local architect. The extent to which the users of the buildings participate can vary from consultation to full control, and it operates at many different scales, from the individual home to the planning of entire neighbourhoods.

The idea of creating an environment directly responsive to people's social and cultural aspirations encourages and reinforces personal identity and a sense of community which is absent from virtually all mass housing and inner city renewal schemes of the last 40 years. The method of commissioning buildings in post-Second World War reconstruction has led to enormous social as well as technical failures, such as high-rise and deck-access flats. The cost of putting them right has been estimated at more than £5 billion by the end of the century. The problem is not confined to this country; of course, but it is most evident in the more technically advanced countries of the world and not least in America.

But in many pioneering schemes throughout the worst afflicted twilight areas, community architecture has been shown to work. Liverpool, Glasgow, Birmingham, Manchester, Newcastle and Macclesfield are among towns and cities which have benefitted from this new approach.

The keys to its success are the disaggregation of the scale of the project (small is beautiful); the devolution of power to a residents' association, tenants' group or town trust; and giving people access to professional advice which may be a local authority architect or private consultant living and working in the same community as his clients, the users of his buildings.

HOW COMMUNITY ARCHITECTURE GREW

1960s: Dramatic growth of voluntary and private-based groups protesting about official architecture and planning.

1969: Skellington Report, People and Planning is published, the first Government inquiry into methods of public participation. Shelter's Neighbourhood Action Project launched in Liverpool, with a resident architect working in a local community for the first time.

Early 1970s: Calls for citizen participation in shaping the environment from writers and academics such as Colin Ward and John F. Turner. A new breed of radical 'community architects' start working for local groups in Glasgow, Macclesfield, Newcastle and London.

1973: Town and Country Planning Association launches Planning Aid Unit to co-ordinate a network of professionals willing to assist community groups.

1975: Term 'Community Architecture' is coined to describe the work by architect Rod Hodge in Black Road, Macclesfield.

1976: Community Architecture Working Group formed by the Royal Institute of British Architects.

1977: Architectural Aid Scheme launched in Norfolk by architects holding 'surgeries' at Citizens Advice Bureaux. Community architecture lectures in BBC Television's Tomorrow's World programme.

1979: The first Community Technical Aid Centres open in Manchester and Liverpool with architects and other professionals providing environmental assistance to community groups.

1981: Inner city riots erupt in Britain, Tosteth, Moss Side.

1982: Liverpool's first new-build co-operative completed. Community Projects Scheme launched by RIBA with money from Department of the Environment's Urban Initiatives Fund so that community groups can appoint their own architect.

1983: Association of Community Technical Aid Centres (ACTAC) launched.

1984: The Prince of Wales endorses community architecture in a speech in May to architects at Hampton Court Palace. In October Westminster City Council appoints community architect.

1985 January: Government backs £6.5 million Liverpool housing co-operative, by-passing Left-wing city council. A month later the Prince reaffirms his support for community architecture when he addresses 4,000 businessmen at the Institute of Directors' annual convention at the Royal Albert Hall. On the same day the Government announces it is to launch five City Action Teams (CATS) as inner city troubleshooters. In March the Archbishop of Canterbury, Dr Robert Runcie, endorses the RIBA's Community Urban Design Assistance Teams project (CUDATS) in a speech which also refers to his Commission on Urban Priority Areas, due to report later this year. In April RIBA launches Urban Assistance Group and the Decaying Britain Campaign.

A fundamental change has come about in the role of the architect; he is no longer a provider but an enabler, helping people to help themselves. He has more concern for the process of building than the final product, although that, too, is often superior in quality as a result of involving users. The barriers against this new approach - such as paternalistic professional attitudes and political dogmatism - are gradually being overcome.

Perhaps the most significant recent step has been the interest shown by industry and the financial institutions in funding such schemes; and the willingness of local authorities to enter into joint partnerships with the private sector for self-help and self-build community architecture projects.

We are only at the start of a fundamental change in the approach to breathing new life into our troubled inner cities. The scale of the problem is immense, but while much of what has been built in recent years has proved to be an environmental disaster - and therefore may be seen as part of the problem - community architecture is a major contribution to the solution, both for inner cities and elsewhere.

CASE STUDIES

LIVERPOOL

Public sector housing has been rejuvenated by new-build co-operatives. More than 800 families have formed 17 co-ops to build new homes.

Each group appoints its own architect and is involved in all design decisions, from overall scheme layout to the colour of the bricks. When the families move in, they manage their own estate.

A sense of pride and community spirit has been reborn. The co-ops experience no problems with vandalism, repairs are carried out promptly and the elderly are well cared for.

Bill Hallsall, an experienced co-op architect, says: "It's environmental emancipation. If the process could be extended over the whole city it could really become an amazing place to live."

BIRMINGHAM

Britain's most extensive and systematic community architecture service is Birmingham City Council's urban renewal programme.

As soon as they move in they call a public meeting and encourage the formation of a residents' association. Housing improvement programmes are worked out together, including the design of external areas such as parks and playgrounds.

Project worker Frances Heywood says: "It's given people pride in their area."

Playtime in the cities

LONDON

Free Form Arts Trust, based in Hackney, has pioneered the involvement of artists in environmental projects and demonstrated the immense creative potential of community architecture.

Its funding comes from the Arts Council, the London Borough of Hackney, the Department of the Environment and the Gulbenkian Foundation. The projects range from improving run-down estates to transforming derelict sites.

Today's launch of these inner city initiatives by the Government and Royal Institute of British Architects is a landmark in the revolution which is transforming house building and design. Its roots are in community action which sprang up in the cities in the late 1960s, but it received an enormous boost recently when the Prince of Wales twice publicly praised "community architecture". It is the process by which people are directly involved in managing the buildings and environment

NEXT YEAR, THE BRITISH ECONOMY WILL BE AFFECTED BY WHAT GOES ON INSIDE THE SENATE, THE HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT AND THIS SHEEP'S STOMACH.

This sheep consumes glass. And a lot healthier she is for it, too.

What sets her (and flocks of other sheep) apart from her less fortunate cousins is a Pilkington product called Cosecure.

Cosecure is a pellet made from soluble glass. Incorporating 3 essential trace elements and fed to livestock once a year, it stays in the stomach for the entire 12 months.

Gradually it safely dissolves and releases the trace elements at exactly the rate the sheep needs them.

But Cosecure doesn't only make sheep healthier.

It'll provide a shot in the arm for the British economy, too - because although it may sound like a gimmick, it's badly needed by farmers in Britain and abroad.

In fact Cosecure could become the biggest product in the animal health market, which worldwide is worth over £2,000m.

But controlled release glass also has vast potential in the drug industry, in oil, in agrochemicals, shipping, sanitation and building.

Exciting though the idea of soluble glass is, we're well aware that one product doesn't make a company.

But the tiny family business from St. Helens which started making windows during The Industrial Revolution now has an enormous range of products, giving us a worldwide turnover of over £1,200,000,000.

Take, for example, our Reactolite Rapide sunglasses, a Pilkington invention which incredibly has three quarters of the Japanese market.

A product Pilkington can put alongside parts for satellites, parts for lasers and solar cells, for fibre optics and Concorde. Even for the Popemobile.

And we have high hopes for Cemfil glass fibre, which is better qualified to replace asbestos than any other material currently available.

Of course, not all of Pilkington's products will make sheep any healthier.

But every one's a tonic for Britain's economy.

BOOKS I

Daddy's girl

Here is a shoddy piece of publishing from Weidenfeld, who claim that Professor Peters' book will become the standard biography of Anna Freud. It will certainly not become a standard anything in this translation (copyright Schocken Books Inc. no translator mentioned) which appears to be the work of someone with a deficient grasp of either English or German or perhaps both. Bad sentence construction. "Hartmann was analyzed by Freud - in fact for free - who was also Anna Freud's training analyst". Faulty use of words: "trenchant" remarks are dismissed out of hand in a context which makes it probable that the remarks were merely cutting. Endless verbal repetitions, which may be Professor Peters' fault but which should certainly have been edited out, if Schocken Books Inc had been able to spare an editor.

There are small mysteries. Anna's dog was a German shepherd called Wolf. "On Freud's seventieth birthday, Anna Freud wrote a poem on the dog's body, had it photographed and presented Freud with the photograph as a birthday card". Now how did she do that? With an aerosol? Ronald Clark's biography of Freud comes to the rescue. The poem was attached to the dog - surely a wiser device, when you're dealing with a German shepherd.

If the translator is at fault here, it is surely Professor Peters who misleads us in describing Melanie Klein's Vienna home as being "only a few blocks - almost a stone's throw - from the Freud's apartment". As the stone throws, Tifer

James Fenton on a biography of Freud's youngest child, Anna, who also became a world-famous psycho-analyst

ANNA FREUD
A Life for Children
By Uwe Henrik Peters
Weidenfeld & Nicolson, £16.95

Graben is the best part of a kilometre away from the Bergasse, at least ten blocks and you have to cross the Ring. But then the Professor has seven league boots. He describes London as "nearby" Vienna.

And he means it. London is "only a few minutes' flying time from the German cultural sphere", the sphere which Anna and her father left in 1938 as the Nazis cracked down on psychoanalysis and Jews. The serious and in a sense personal ambition of this book is to reclaim the memory and reputation of Anna Freud for the German public, for whom she is, as Professor Peters tells us, a somewhat remote figure, and for whom her work after 1938 is obscure. The biographer, who was a child during the war, could hardly have had a more discouraging first meeting with his subject. She looked him over from head to toe and said: "you look like an SS man". But Professor Peters was not utterly discouraged, or does not show it. He says instead: "Anna Freud's customary frankness is evident in these surprising words. Interestingly, what appeared to be an expression of distrust was at the same time the introduction to lengthy and candid talks".

Anna's fierceness paid off. The biography contains I think only one mild criticism of its subject (that she sometimes misplaced her trust - meaning I suppose that she shouldn't have let Jeffrey Masson anywhere near the Freud archive), and devotes much space to the exhortation of her enemies or not-quite-faithful friends. Professor Peters is quick to detect an insult. So we must not call Anna "the incarnate heir of the psychoanalytic movement" since this "would imply a disregard of her own outstanding achievements." I can't see the logic of this, but once again the translation may be at fault, surely it is her supporters who would say that she "inherited Freud's mantle", or some such phrase. Even perhaps "her incarnate".

As for the independent achievement: "Her own creation was a psychoanalysis for children", says the book, meaning that "psychoanalysis for children was her own creation." And this brings us to the crux of the matter, as Professor Peters sees it: Anna Freud, then not Melanie Klein. This is a fighting book, in which the affront offered to

Anna Freud - especially interested in children's problems

Freud's daughter by the Kleinian movement has been neither forgiven nor forgotten.

Psychoanalysis is supposed to be a healing art rather than a weapon. When surgeons gather for a conference, one imagines that they leave their scalpels in the cloakroom. When analysts gather, there is apparently no provision for this. An angry or obnoxious analyst has plenty of lethal tools at his disposal, and when one thinks how any group of analysts will be linked by a very complicated set of personal and professional ties (and it will be hard to tell the two apart) one can guess that the opportunity to wound may sometimes be irresistible.

The charge that Professor Peters makes concerns a 1927 symposium held in London, dominated by Klein and her supporters, who were egged on by Ernest Jones. The implication of certain remarks made by Klein and Ella Sharpe was that Anna Freud's approach to child analysis was vitiated by the fact that she herself had been insufficiently analysed (because her training analyst was her father). According to Sharpe: "In the insufficiently analysed analyst, as in the child, a deeply marred superego, condemnatory of sexuality, is at work." You can see how this might wound. Anna had never married, and there is hardly any suggestion of romance throughout this whole study. In plain language, Klein and her supporters are supposed to have been saying: Your child analysis is up the spout because you're in love with your dad and unable to face the fact.

The attack was furious, and if Professor Peters is right it was also hypocritical, since in recommending the superiority of her own approach to child analysis Klein had omitted to mention that the first child she had analysed was her son. She was claiming that she, Klein, could get at the Oedipus complex in a male child, while Anna Freud said this was impossible. But, according to Klein's own logic, her clinical evidence was cooked.

I have checked these charges against the account of Klein given by Hannah Segal, but unfortunately Professor Peters' book appeared in Germany in the same year as Segal's monograph (so Peters is six years out of date in saying here that there is no biography of Klein - another sloppiness). Segal describes the symposium and the later rifts in the London analytical world. From her you get the impression that in the end it was sorted out fairly amicably, and that the divisions within the association were accommodated in a gentlemanly way. From Peters you do not get this impression, but I have to say that I find Peters a trifle naive.

Anna Freud, we are told, never defended herself. Had she done so, "a schism between continental European and English psychoanalysis would have been inevitable. In any case, time worked, even if very slowly, in Anna Freud's favour. As always, she accepted personal injury as simply an important and regular part of life's experience." But of course Anna Freud defended herself. Here she is, through the medium of Professor Peters (and I can't believe he is the first such medium), fighting manfully in her own defence. When she told Professor Peters he looked like an SS man, what she was saying was: "Either adore me utterly or get out". But if he turned his back on Anna Freud, that would mean that he was, indeed, an SS man.

PERCY CHAPMAN: A BIOGRAPHY
By David Lemmon
Queen Anne Press, £9.95

We have recently had biographies of two English cricket captains, G. O. B. Allen and A. P. F. Chapman. They were contemporaries (Chapman was born in 1900, Allen in 1902), though Chapman's Test career came first. They overlapped in the England side only once, when Allen played under Chapman in the famous Test against Australia at Lord's in 1930. They were both amateurs, as England captains had to be in those days, and the amount they could play was limited by business demands. They were both Cambridge men. Chapman had the better record as a captain. He actually won nine Tests consecutively, including six against Australia. Allen has made the greater contribution to the game, especially in its higher counsels. He was president of MCC in 1963. Chapman won in Australia 4-1, and did not play in the defeat. Allen lost 3-2, after being two up.

ROBERT HALE

E. W. Swanton, an old friend, has written a detailed, urbane life of Allen. He was one of the best all-rounders of the 1930s, and one of the fastest bowlers. His figures would have been impressive had he been able to play regularly, but quite apart from business claims, perhaps the daily grind of the county circuit was not his idea of the happiest life. He was good enough to be chosen for England even when out of regular practice. Although an enthusiastic player as you could wish, he was not of the win-at-all-costs school. When in Australia under Jardine, he refused to bowl body-line, at some risk to his place in the side. This was possibly not altogether a disadvantage to him, for the batsmen may have been inclined to take risks when they could get away from the bouncers of Larwood and Voce. But Allen's career stands as a model of good gentlemanly sportsmanship.

David Lemmon had a more complicated task with Chapman. Indeed, he had to deal with the stuff of tragedy. In his youth, Chapman was a left-handed batsman of unequalled potential. Comparisons with his Kent team-mate Woolley did not seem out of place.

As he grew older his batting genius flamed only intermittently, though he remained one of the outstanding fielders of his time. The young Chapman was frequently compared to a particularly apt analogy: an outside cherub would have been nearer the mark, increasingly outside as he grew older. He was employed by a brewery, which was generous in giving him time off for cricket. He died, aged 61, an alcoholic. His popularity, immense when he regained the Ashes at the Oval in 1926, dwindled, and in later life he became an embarrassment to his friends. Mr Lemmon tells this harrowing story clearly and fairly, though as a book it does sometimes get cluttered up with superfluous statistics.

Chapman, like Allen, enjoyed winning, but not at any price. Indeed, he was often criticized for recklessness in his batting, but that was his way, and part of his appeal. In that Lord's Test of 1930 he made 121 at a time when England looked out of it. He went for everything, but England lost a match which they might have saved with a touch more caution. For the last Test of that series he was dropped. There was uproar, and it does seem an odd decision to retrospect, but Chapman lost some sympathy by unwise comments in the press. His judgement was already becoming uncertain.

The Constable Cricket Classics series have been launched with a re-issue of Australia 55 by Alan Ross, (£8.95) which gives us a picture of a captain of quite another kind, Sir Leonard Hutton. It was a pleasure to read this elegantly written book again: few tour books can be read with satisfaction more than once unless they transcend the cricket. This does. I hope Constable also have Ross's Cape Summer on their list.

Anyone with the slightest experience of the great Sahara desert is baffled by its French connection. Until the discovery of oil beneath those wastes it was a wilderness whose occasional oases yielded no more than subsistence to a handful of nomads. Why on earth would any European power have wished to claim it as empire? The question might be asked of the Italians as well, with their holdings in arid Libya, after 1911.

In this account of la mission civilisatrice in those parts, Douglas Porch reckons that French colonialism everywhere was invariably military (in contrast to the British variety, which was generally mercantile). The bully boys from St Germain launched themselves at the Sahara partly in a spirit of "me too" after the British and the Germans had surged to carve up Africa, but the most profound impulse, according to Porch, was the humiliation of

THE CONQUEST OF THE SAHARA

French arms at Sedan in 1870. In other words, the Western Sahara was conquered mostly because French soldiers needed to restore their prestige, and this looked as if it might be the pushover that Bismarck's Prussians decidedly hadn't been.

The Sahara was anything but an easy victory, however. The Flatters mission of 1880 from Constantine in the North was almost wiped out by Tuareg, and its remnant only survived retreat across the desert by resorting to cannibalism. The Bonnier mission of 1893 from Senegal was also smashed before reaching its objective of Timbuktu. Both expeditions were part of a drive to put a railway across the Sahara, in the naive belief that colonies would spring up.

By the time the daftness of this plan was conceded, the military had their footholds on the perimeters of the desert, and Porch argues that Algeria today has more of the Sahara than either Morocco or Tunisia because the French colonial troops based there were more aggressive than their comrades stationed elsewhere. It was from Biskra that Lamy's expedition crossed 1,800 miles of desert towards Chad, losing 400 out of 1,000 camels in the process. It was from Temassinin that Theodore Poin developed the strategy of the Saharians, the light camel corps which raided swiftly, in the manner of the Tuareg themselves, to pacify the interior under Poin's successor Laperriere. They at last sealed French supremacy over these nomads in 1902, at the memorably piquant Battle of Tit.

Douglas Porch tells all this with verve and great attention to detail, though there are two surprising omissions. That part of the desert which became Mauritania is inexcusably neglected. And although the author well conveys the sensations of the Sahara by extensive reference to the writings of travellers there, myself included, he strangely misses the work of Theodore Monod, who has more authority on the subject than any other half dozen of us put together. The publisher has rather more to answer for. The price is outrageous for a book without illustration apart from a solitary, inadequate, map.

Dowdy feminist, Guardian angel

Fiona MacCarthy

BEFORE I GO
Reflections on my life and times
By Mary Stott
112 pp. £9.95 (hbk) £4.50 (pbk)

Has there ever been a page in the history of journalism so suffused with its editor's distinctive personality as was the Guardian women's page throughout the 1960s? That editor, of course, was Mary Stott, friend of housebound housewives, progenitor (not, please, progenitress) of pre-school playgroups, campaigner for the rights of single women looking after old dependents, and tireless supporter of a dozen other causes closely connected with women's liberation which made the Guardian women's page in those days such an object of both admiration and satire.

Her very stimulating book of thoughts and views and reminiscences gives us many chances to relive those heady years of feminist campaigning (through some of which I worked, in fact, as Mary Stott's assistant, in a role roughly akin to that of valet to Lord Kitchener).

Mary Stott, as an editor, was absolutely credible because she was professional. Having taken the tough way up through the provincial newspapers she was as experienced a technician, and knew as much of journalistic nuts and bolts, as her male colleagues. In a world in which, overtly or implicitly, the law of the casting director's couch prevails, this was of course unusual, and she is most amusing on the topic of sexual harassment (or lack of it) in the higher echelons of Guardian editorial.

As a feminist she has always been a gradualist, a constitutionalist, believing firmly that if they conduct themselves with dignity and wisdom women, in the end, cannot fail to be convincing. In her retirement, widowed, living in London, she has become very much a public spokesman (not "spokeswoman", not "spokesperson") from the rational traditional middle ground of feminism, the lobby for co-operation rather than castration. She has the first-things-first philosophy of true campaigners, finding it convenient to buy her clothes at Oxfam, and describes herself endearingly as going on a Women's International Day march in very dowdy long black coat, black hat and boots.

Mary being Mary she is keen on euthanasia. She is a life (sic) member and indeed Vice President of the Voluntary Euthanasia Society and, near at hand at home, keeps her own Guide to Self-Deliverance. On the basis of this book such precautions are premature. At 76 she still has a long campaign to fight against the automatic writing-off of oldish people. Her book has all the virtues of strength, clarity and tolerance which (wrongly) we associate with those of half her age.

Illywhacker? You know, quondam, spicer, ripper, man. Colloquial Australian a little rusty perhaps? Oh, all right then, it means professional trickster or conman. Herbert Badger is 139. Or so he tells us. Trouble is, Herbert's such a terrible liar. It's been the sine qua non of a career which has ranged from pioneer aviator, via car salesman, to the more esoteric callings of gold prospector and snake dancer's assistant. Whether he was really any more of an illywhacker than thousands of other young Australians eager to make their way in the world during the slump is open to debate. Herbert actually comes over as a much nicer man than he's prepared to admit - a lover rather than a fighter, but above all the sort of cobbler to whom things happen.

This allows his creator to fill in on some of the less well documented episodes in twentieth-century Australian history. Such as? Well, no, this is not the way to approach Peter Carey's extraordinary second novel. Like its predecessor, the ecstatically received Bliss, Illywhacker is not an easy book to describe, still less to summarize. Imagine, if you can, a cross between Tristram Shandy and Thomas Pynchon's V, a family saga that keeps plunging off into fantasy, a compendium of colonial vignettes which alternate between social history and science-fiction. Insert the resulting hybrid into a hessian bag (in Herbert's view the most useful piece of equipment a man can possess) with a small menagerie of emus, goannas and above all the deadly snakes which keep interrupting the precarious narrative thread of Illywhacker, and you may get some idea of the book's sheer improbability. To read it is to be bewildered, albeit most agreeably.

Peter Carey is a real original, a master of literary hocus pocus. I dread to think what he will conjure up next.

Janice Elliott is another writer with a convincing line in magic, or at least in the force of coincidence. But not for her the cosy coincidences which make David Lodge's Small World such a charming spot. You know that the series of bizarre events which follow William and Fanny Farmer's arrival in Tuscany with their trendy friends Jay and Lisa is going to end in tears. You can conjecture all you will. If only Fanny hadn't stopped to answer the fragile waif at Florence airport, or William had managed to flick off the hornet before it stung him. Perhaps if the weather had been kinder, or the company at San Salvatore a little less precious...

But no. When a writer as resourceful as Janice Elliott takes it into her head to demonstrate the fickleness of fate, all her characters can do is put their heads in their hands and wait for the thunderbolts to strike. Miss Elliott's admirers will not need to be told that she has a genius for unsettling her readers too.

Peter de Polnay has been turning out well-made, traditional novels for half a century. The Guest House is set in Paris. It describes a young Englishman's efforts to rid himself of the guilt he feels at being a murderer's son. An old-fashioned theme, but stylishly worked with due attention paid to the classic literary virtues of setting and character.

Stan Lee is at the end of a literary career. In fact Dunn's Conundrum is his first novel, and a remarkable tour de force it is. Harry Dunn runs The Library, the Intelligence Agency to end all such, where the need to know principle has been supplanted by the need to know everything.

Thanks to the miracles of Information Technology, for the first time the left hand of government knows what the right hand is doing, with predictably dire consequences for the rest of us. This is a tightly constructed, witty-thriller, good on technical detail and gripping until, well, almost the end.

After Franco, the reign in Spain

Richard Wigg

THE TRANSFORMATION OF SPAIN FROM FRANCO TO THE CONSTITUTIONAL MONARCHY
By David Gilmour
Quercus, £12.95

Now Spain has finally been granted a place in an enlarged Common Market, David Gilmour's account of exactly how one of the most encouraging democratic transformations undergone by a European nation in modern times was achieved is particularly welcome.

He lays it all out clearly, with a conspicuously wide range of fair judgements, hitting now at the left and then at the right, and puncturing a lot of platitudes and comforting lies cultivated by differing sections of Spanish society.

Franco's regime, he says right at the beginning of the book, survived for so long "because a determined minority wanted it to survive, because a larger group of people were not prepared to fight another Civil War to overthrow it, and because the rest of the population was either coerced into accepting it or else prevented from doing anything that could conceivably be regarded as a threat to its existence".

Gilmour is good in the historical opening chapters, bringing out how the Franco regime had outlived its time, and how the middle classes wanted to put something more European in its place, and yet conserve the economic gains they had made.

The kernel of the book is of course the explanation of how Senor Adolfo Suarez, a former top official of the Francoite Movimiento chosen by the newly installed King, Don Juan Carlos I, at the bidding, Gilmour holds, of Torquato Fernandez Miranda, President of the Cortes and of the Council of the Realm, ushered in the democratic process.

Two Spanish eyes. Juan Carlos (right) with Premier Suarez

It was a major act of statesmanship, and quite if you like, and the book captures well all the main elements in the process. He has read very widely, extracting the vital essence from the often meandering memoirs of some of the participants.

The trouble comes over Gilmour's treatment of the two main figures, the King and especially of Adolfo Suarez himself. He does not give us the colour and feel of these two personalities. The analysis of Suarez's achievement is decidedly cool. We are thus quite unprepared for the judgement in the book's epilogue: "He accomplished more than any other Prime Minister in the history of Spain."

Gilmour relies heavily on the accounts of the transition by Jose Maria de Arellano, the former Foreign Minister, and Alfonso Osorio, one-time close associate of Suarez in government. He also uses what he admits is a hostile biography, a picture of Suarez others would describe as the vademecum of nostalgic right-wingers who can never forgive Suarez his "betrayal".

So far as the eye can tell, Gilmour did not obtain Suarez's own account of the transition. The former Prime Minister is notoriously difficult for journalists to see, but Senor Suarez has given his account, notable at an Ortega y Gasset Foundation Seminar. It is a pity Gilmour does not give in the book his judgment on the Suarez version which, naturally, in various aspects may be self-serving.

Gilmour admits Suarez is "a very modern politician," instancing his consummate use of television in the two general elections he won. But the picture he draws of the former premier is unflattering. Gilmour apparently never experienced, or certainly never succumbs to, Suarez's great charm, at personal level, on the box, or addressing political meetings. Now he is in a strange political wilderness. One must, in contrast, emphasize the Spanish people's warmly expressed gratitude to Adolfo Suarez for all he did for them.

Woodward reports without moral judgement, presumably hoping that the facts will speak for themselves. But the important ones are smothered under a massive weight of documentary ephemera.

Hammer in reverse

Unthinkable as it sounds, the upper crust staff of Sotheby's, who have long been paid in peanuts and prestige, are meeting next week to consider setting up a trade union. Alfred Taubman, who said during his £87 million takeover two years ago that "buying Sotheby's is like buying the throne", is reported to be incandescent with rage. The staff, who fear Taubman will step on their plans before they meet next Thursday, will not do anything so illiberal as to submit to the embrace of Clive Jenkins and his white-collar ASTMS. Instead they will form their own union, concealing it under the euphemism of the Society of Sotheby's Art Operatives. Meanwhile, supporters of the proposed union are being condemned by Sotheby's directors, one of whom was heard to remark yesterday "I never knew you were a traitor to this company... it is a matter of honour." Yesterday Sotheby's managing director, Tim Llewellyn, said he was unaware of the union plans.

The Speaker, Bernard Weatherill, went down with mumps yesterday - caught, he believes, from his grandchildren over Easter. Princess Margaret, who sat beside him at the Windsor banquet for the President of Malawi the night before, has had it already, otherwise her trip to Hungary, which begins today, might have been suddenly cut short. At Westminster, MPs have opened an unofficial book on which of their colleagues will be the first to pay the penalty for ingratiating themselves with the unwell Speaker. Hot favourite is Peter Brunt, closely followed by Edwina Currie.

● An important recommendation from the Department of the Environment grants working group. The amount spent by councils on cemeteries and crematoria should be calculated not per head of living population as at present, it says, but by the number who die. This is "felt to provide an improved measure of demand".

I doubt that Labour Party HQ is too thrilled by the recruitment efforts of Stoney Labour party. The Holy Trinity ward has issued a leaflet depicting Peter Shore, Stoney's Labour MP, Neil Kinnock and TUC chief Norman Willis stabbing a miner in the back beside the words "Fight the Tories - Join the Labour Party". Not a word about fighting the Tories.

It looks as if that great American institution Playboy is giving aid and succour to Nicaragua's Sandinista regime. Vice-president Sergio Ramirez, best known as a novelist before the 1979 revolution, is boasting that he has just been paid $4,000 for a short story in the April edition of the magazine. The title of the "militarily-orientated" piece: Even Charles Atlas Dies.

● After reading an account yesterday of how his father, Lord Ladbroke, lost a leg at Waterloo, the Marquess of Anglesey told the British Orthopaedic Association of an earlier response. "What a pity. Which platform?"

The keys affair

Shades of Goldilocks at the Commons. Police are investigating the unauthorized use of MPs' typewriters during the Easter break. One offender, allegedly a member of the raucous Federation of Conservative Students, was sufficiently stupid to leave his name on the ribbon of the machine of Tory MP David Knox. As a report was being prepared for Tory whips yesterday, another Tory MP's secretary - too afraid to see her name in print - had also found her machine tampered with. All this just weeks after a select committee urged tighter security in the Commons.

Rival bidders

The selection of the new City of London police commissioner is turning into a two-horse race. Assistant commissioner Owen Kelly is assumed to be one runner. The other is David Hall, Humberstone's chief constable, currently less than popular with the local Labour-controlled police authority because of his policing of the miners' strike. He will be squeezing into top hat and tails for his final appearance before the City Court of Common Council on May 20.

P.H.S.

999: end this cause for alarm

by John Gunnell

During a recent visit to the West Yorkshire Fire Service the Home Secretary, Leon Brittan, indicated that he had no plans to split up either the police or fire services in the county. I asked Mr Brittan for his reasoning. I was told about the efficiency of the fire service and its central control system, which gives rapid response throughout the county, and of the insignificance of district boundaries to the protection services.

Of course, he was absolutely correct: the amalgamation of the seven former brigades in West Yorkshire brought genuine economies of scale as well as a better service. Despite this, assurances given by the Minister of State, Giles Shaw, have brought into the open serious differences between the Home Office, which expects minimal savings on the protection services, and the Department of the Environment, which has calculated on a quite different basis.

At present, the Home Office approves amounts that can be spent on the protection services before county councils consider their general budgets. These budgets must then be pruned, bearing in mind the competing needs of all the services the councils provide and the relationship of their total spending to the rate precept. As far as the Fire Service is concerned, the final approved budget in West Yorkshire is still 26 per cent above the figure set by the Department of the Environment.

The open split among senior ministers, underlined by Lord Whitelaw's comment that there would be "a difficult problem getting the police authorities right after the metropolitan counties are over", makes public the private views of senior Home Office officials. They did not want this legislation and are not prepared to have their level of service determined by the Department of the Environment. Lord Whitelaw, however, takes the argument from the purely financial to the more sensitive area of political responsibilities and control. Are joint boards likely to offer a sensitive, reliable, responsible mechanism for supplying key services?

Shortly after becoming leader of West Yorkshire Metropolitan County Council I was involved in a series of high-level discussions on the "fall-out" from the Yorkshire Ripper. Later, in the House of Commons, Whitelaw publicly praised the handling of the matter and, although subsequent events have provided disappointments, the role of the police authority has never been criticized. Indeed it is to its credit that the computer systems in West Yorkshire are more effective than anywhere else in the country - its role in the arrest of the "Fox" has been acknowledged widely within the police force.

Can a joint board, lacking the confidence and authority of direct elections, be as effective? And given that the district councils will continue to put their most able members on services they control rather than share, will the members of police authorities be as capable as at present? Lord Whitelaw highlights a genuine problem of great importance, even to this government.

After the Home Secretary had explained his reasons for wishing to retain the protection services on a county-wide basis, I asked him to which metropolitan county services his own arguments did not apply. He told me that he had studied no others in detail. It is a pity, because had he done so he would have found that the same arguments apply to them all, and that the only way of ensuring local rather than central control of strategic county services is through a directly elected county council.

Senior officials in other departments responsible for the services provided by the metropolitan county councils all share the view that the legislation proposing their abolition is entirely political and will be a nightmare in practice. Is it too much to expect that their ministers will explore the doubts in private which Lord Whitelaw and the Home Office are expressing in public? There is still time to abort this legislative nonsense with dignity, but very little time indeed.

Cherchez la difference

Something perplexing but important is happening to French political thought. Parties of the left and right are struggling to bring their language of political appeal into alignment with the reality of a France less sure of its place in the world than ever before.

The signs of this crisis of self-confidence are like straws in the wind, but they add up to a fear that in the economy a rigid, privileged structure is proving unable to adapt to the American and Japanese challenge. Economic essayist Alain Minc recently compared present-day France to eighteenth-century Amsterdam, which faded into genteel economic decline in the face of rising British power. He wondered aloud whether the frontier of the world economy might not be shifting inexorably towards the Pacific rim countries, leaving Europe a dusty museum for American and Japanese tourists.

If the awakening of the French to Europe's relative economic decline has been slower than in Britain it is because the strong growth of the de Gaulle and Pompidou eras hid French weaknesses in new technology. The political rhetoric of de Gaulle's successors is now focused almost exclusively on the task of re-establishing that golden era.

All the major party leaders - Jacques Chirac, Raymond Barre, Giscard d'Estaing and Francois Mitterrand - have taken up the rhetoric of modernization and are putting stress on words which ring strangely in French ears: entrepreneurship, marketing and management.

The parties of the right find it difficult to square the new neo-Reaganianism with their Gaullist heritage of state intervention in the economy, while socialist militants resist their leaders' embrace of market principles. The electorate seems puzzled and disenchanted by political adversaries whose opposing battle cries muffle the real convergence of their views.

The new climate affects cultural self-confidence too. The collapse of Marxism - the matrix of most post-war French social thought - coupled with the knowledge that the rhetoric of modernization is an American import has led to a sense that French culture is no longer producing a political language adequate to its own realities. Didier Mouchane, the left-wing socialist intellectual now out of favour with the Mitterrand government, has written acerbically that he sees no reason why French socialism should preside over the modernization of French capitalism.

Yet because the intellectual standing of Marxism is so low, and because most critics on the left do not want to be seen giving comfort to the right, Mouchane has been unable to attract much of a following for his critique of the Socialist government's policies. Hence an embarrassed silence on the left has greeted Mitterrand's pragmatic embrace of modernization.

Sales of the machine have been sluggish to say the least. About 5,000 were reported to have been sold by Sinclair Vehicles through mail order in the first four weeks after its launch at the beginning of the year. Since then the company, reluctant to disclose sales figures, has suspended production for three weeks and is making plans to alter substantially some of the trike's features to gain approval for use on continental roads.

Sinclair is a dream-maker and a successful one. He can take credit for being one of the principal influences in putting thousands of computers into British homes. Since 1979, then trading through his old company Sinclair Radionics, he has invented calculators, watches, pocket televisions, home computers and now an electric vehicle.

Sinclair's dream of a computer in every home has in part been realized. An eager and sympathetic public helped him do so, making him a millionaire in the process. Other accolades followed, the most notable being a knighthood.

Somewhere along the line, however, Sir Clive has lost his public, which has not grasped his vision of the C5 as a revolution in personal transport. While hoteliers and holiday camps have been enthusi-

In any event there is no one on the French intellectual scene capable of leading a public debate on the transformation of French political argument. The deaths of Raymond Aron, Roland Barthes, Michel Foucault, Jacques Lacan and Jean Paul Sartre have left a void which remains unfilled.

The Mitterrand government's twists and turns in office have scarcely comforted those looking for socialist consistency. In the first two years, its policy had autarchic features: on the economic front, an attempt to go it alone with domestic reflation; on the cultural front a policy designed to curtail foreign media penetration, especially from America. Within a short time pressure on the franc, a worsening trade deficit and a declining competitive position forced the government to bring its policies in line with the economic austerity practised in America and Britain.

The result has been the break-up of the Socialist-Communist alliance and a growing conviction among militants and intellectuals that French socialism is socialist only in name.

At the same time, as the philosopher Andre Glucksmann and the sociologist Alain Touraine have pointed out, the government's policies of modernization have effectively destroyed the industrial and social base of socialism itself. Closing down the Lorraine steel works, running down the coal industry and putting the Le Creusot manufacturing region into mothballs may be making French industry more competitive but it is also destroying the workers' movement which provided socialist tradition with its massed battalions.

It is a significant indication of the different attitudes of French and British socialists towards deindustrialization that French socialists saw the British miners' strike as a failure to look the facts of European economic life in the eye.

With no specifically socialist policies to distinguish it from its right-wing rivals and with its electoral base eroding, the Mitterrand government increasingly appeals to voters in the language of republicanism. Liberte, Egalite, Fraternite has become the party's rallying cry. Republicanism is an acceptable form of nationalism for socialists. Like Mrs Thatcher and Mr Reagan, Mitterrand understands the party advantage of patriotic sentiment.

Yet in the French case this move has its ironies. Throughout the de Gaulle era, Mitterrand opposed the republican constitution on the grounds that it gave the general too much power. After four years in the Elysee he has apparently lost his scruples or his doubts. In office he has become the most monarchical of republicans.

Republicanism, however recent or inconsistent, also serves to legitimize a shift in socialist thought away from post-1968 egalitarianism towards a patriotic appeal for social discipline. The recent call by Jean-Pierre Chevènement, the education minister, for a return to stricter standards of examination and discipline is not only designed to make the school the hearth of republican patriotism in Mitterrand's France, as it was in Clemenceau's, but also to put paid to socialism's association in the public mind with the laxity of the 1960s.

Faced with a socialism shedding its traditional skin and a right wing shaking off its Gaullist enthusiasm for an all-directing state, French voters seem unable to decide whether these changes of language are cynical opportunism or a necessary mutation of vocabulary in the face of reality. A recent poll in the Paris newspaper Liberation revealed that more than a quarter of those sampled no longer identified themselves with either right or left, and a majority were unable to say whether the current government's policies were socialist or not.

When asked what socialism ought to stand for, those polled rejected the old socialist agenda of nationalization in favour of a much vaguer adherence to a set of values of generosity, fraternity and social justice. Socialism's dilemma in France, as elsewhere, is how to translate such values into practical policy.

Whatever else the poll may indicate, it seems to show that after 15 years of cultural and economic crisis, French voters no longer recognize themselves or their interests in the symbolic garb of French politics. They are struggling, like their politicians, to find a language which describes the troubling reality of their lives. If this is the verdict in France, it may also be true in Britain.

The C5, giving Sir Clive an even bumpier ride

Disappointing sales, now substantial design changes

astic about the vehicle it is noticeably absent from the streets of Britain.

Sir Clive has blamed pessimistic press reports. The reality is that the public was promised an electric vehicle which would transform urban driving, a promise unfulfilled by the arrival of the C5.

The ordinary consumer is not alone in having doubts. City financiers are displaying a lack of confidence in the Sinclair company's performance. The British financier is very rarely a visionary. He is in the business of making money, usually in the short term. Two years ago Sinclair sold 10 per cent of his company for £13.5 million to some City institutions. The price of the shares then was £34. Now they are worth about a third of that amount.

In public, Sir Clive remains bullish. In the middle of March he told his shareholders that his company made £7.9 million pretax profit in the first nine months of the financial year, had written off £1.3 million against post-Christmas returns of his products and another £1 million because of price reductions to boost sagging sales of his computers, for which there had been no substantial orders for about two months from mid-December.

In private Sir Clive is probably not so optimistic. The financial problems of Acorn, the maker of the BBC Microcomputer and one of Sinclair's rivals in the home computer market, have worried him. He knew that the City financiers were frightened because of the slump in the Acorn share price. Acorn was launched on the USM (Unlisted Securities Market) two years ago for £136 million. In February the share price dipped to a low of 28p, valuing the company at £30 million and precipitating a rescue bid by Olivetti. Sinclair's ambition of launching his own company on the USM was thwarted.

This will restrict his activities and other products that he has on the market may also strain his resources if they do not sell in bulk. That fact is also worrying City financiers, who have never been at ease with high technology.

First, there is the flat screen television launched 18 months ago with the promise that it would do for television what the transistor radio did for wireless. No current sales figures are officially available.

Secondly, the QL (Quantum Leap) computer sold only 50,000 last year, a disappointment to Sinclair. It is now the subject of a personalized television campaign by Sir Clive to boost sales to 200,000 this year. The price of the Spectrum + home computer has been reduced by nearly a third to £130 to sell in the quantities projected. Overstocking of computers recently caused Sinclair to slow down production for a month. He is also attempting to raise £50 million to finance the building of an advanced microchip factory. The C5 only adds to his problems.

Wanted: a new Thatcher theme

Life is much harder for the Conservatives now than there is, or appears to be, no emergency. In the last Parliament there were two great issues on which Mrs Thatcher gained public support for an austerity programme frightening to Conservative politicians accustomed to winning elections by bread-and-circuses public spending.

The first was the need to defeat inflation at a level frightening to every family in the land. This was so clearly perceived to be vital that, despite rising unemployment, Mrs Thatcher was able to brush aside Tory demands for more public spending designed to create jobs with the valid reply that this had been tried before with no better long-term result than job-destroying inflation. The public knew this was true and accepted austerity in the belief that, as the Government hoped, the fall of inflation would automatically bring a fall in unemployment.

The second great issue was the need not to capitulate again to the demands of unpopular trade unions, which had for so long led to ransom the nation's real living standards, and to try to make union leaders more democratically responsive to their members. Again the Government had public support. Like Mrs Thatcher, the public saw no merit in a replay of attempts to buy union support for incomes policies with political Danegeld.

So Mrs Thatcher won her second term. Her courage and the Falklands had confirmed public respect for her leadership, but it was her invitation to the people through-out her first term to face what they knew to be the facts behind Britain's social and economic malaise that was the firm basis of her second victory.

Now, however, inflation is down to 5 per cent, but unemployment has not fallen with it. The Chancellor has produced a budget for job creation by fiscal change, but there is much scepticism about the time it will take to be effective.

Nor is unemployment the Government's only difficulty. There have been long and apparently unproductive arguments over rates and local government and the Tory party looks somewhat at odds with itself. While one section of the party would like the Government to tackle the jobs problem more by direct spending than fiscal means, another is disturbed by its undertakings to preserve tax exemptions on pensions and mortgages. They argue that the Government has come to a halt in its policy of getting rid of tax distortions to produce the fiscal neutrality needed for jobs.

Such tensions in the party, and the feeling of lost momentum could be damaging to public confidence in the Government, particularly now that Labour is presenting a more plausible facade by suppressing its left-right tensions and policy incoherence. Now that the emergency of the coal strike is over (thanks to the Government's firmness) Labour has already taken the lead in the opinion polls. By the slippage of support to the Alliance (particularly from those easily persuaded that the Government's policies are "confrontational") Labour could be let in and the Thatcher achievements destroyed. It is a curious situation. Life is now more difficult for the Tories precisely because there is no national emergency and because of the Government's past success. But there are always two ways of looking at the same facts, and Mrs Thatcher herself sees these facts differently.

To her, the country's problems are a vast seamless robe of smaller (she would strongly resist the word "minor") questions which all add up to the lack of the sensible enterprise society which is her aim.

There are the teachers who resist assessment of their performance and who do not adequately regard themselves as serving the public, thus impeding the creation of a proper job structure; the next year, a contract of service will have to be drawn up. There are the universities which resist economic rationalization. There are the chairmen and directors of great public companies who give themselves huge pay rises, oblivious of the need to lead by example. There are also the people in the City who charge too much for their services - merchant bankers overcharging on new share issues and brokers asking too much commission.

Mrs Thatcher has not forgotten that the Heath government lost office not only because of public distaste for the easy money fortunes and property boom of that period. She dislikes the British preference for going into money-making by money-dealing instead of getting job-creating small businesses going, and being willing to risk failure and starting again, as in America. Above all, however, is the refusal of unions to accept that union costs are the key to job creation, and the resistance to proper differential between low pay and living on benefits. To all these things she would add the blockages which get in the way of taking the right decisions quickly: Stansford and Sizewell being examples.

Whatever all this adds up to, it is hardly the confrontational politics of which the likes of Bishop Jenkins rebuke the Government - though it is a pragmatic confrontation with a wide range of disparate vested interests. Besides, though Mrs Thatcher is all for the market she does not allow it doctrinal precedence over everything. That is why she has pledged herself to maintain tax relief on mortgages, to her matrimonial home is the strongest thing in a free society.

One of Mrs Thatcher's most engaging characteristics is her urge to give straightforward and detailed answers to a wide range of individual questions instead of reaching for easy generalizations. Even so, she is left with a problem of communications. How in the next phase is she to get across convincingly her priorities and her idea of an enterprise society? If she is to succeed in ensuring that the Labour Party, constituted as it now is, never governs again, she has to convey to the electorate as clear a sense of direction and priorities for the rest of this Parliament as she conveyed in the last.

Stylish, but no Jett-setter

I had never come across the name Letitia G. Jett until quite recently - half an hour ago, in fact, when I opened my Herald Tribune and found a fascinating article by her on the two things in which Letitia G. Jett specializes, fashion and lifestyle. The great Quentin Crisp has always said, and I believe he's right, that the two things are what you adopt when you know who you are, and you stick to it for ever: fashion is what you go for when you don't know who you are, or what you want, so you adopt what other people are wearing or eating.

My lifestyle tends to be based on spending too much money in bookshops, so my cooking goes the same way. At the moment I'm hooked on The Apple Book by Jane Simpson and Gill MacLennan, turning out things like haddock, cider and apple soup or home-made sausages with pork, apple and herbs. I've also revived another apple recipe, leek and apple soup, which I cut out of the Antiques and Jewellery in 1980, and which I consider one of the all-time great soups.

Sooner or later, I suppose, I shall overdose on apple and then I'll move on to Delicious Food, a secondhand 1956 book with an introduction by Noel Coward which I bought the other day. At the moment I'm just rereading the intro, picking up hints on style, but I'll move on to the recipes soon.

My drinking at the moment is dictated by another secondhand book, Cocktail Fashions of 1936, which I bought a week ago. It contains such oddities as Yeck Man Cocktail and Piccadilly Square Cocktail (which shows that it is an American book; show me Piccadilly Square and I'll show you Times Circus). When I say that it dictates my drinking, I mean that I've virtually stopped drinking and gone over to reading the book instead. In fact, most of my cooking sessions with cooking fitted in at the last book, once I've seen me deep in a wine. "Go for quantity rather than quality," Nouvelle cuisine I must have been one of the first to ignore, as I never adopted it in the first place, as for kir, I am well ahead of the trend as I dislike mixing things with wine and don't even like buck's fizz, which I think does a disservice to both champagne and orange juice. Does this make me incredibly

THE WORLD'S MONEY

The finance ministers who control the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank are meeting in Washington to air concerns about debt, trade, currencies, growth, unemployment and famine. Yet these two institutions are more than an excuse for swapping speeches; they are, or were, the twin pillars of the post-war financial settlement. Some fundamental questions about the role of the international institutions themselves ought to be asked through the surface concerns of national finance ministers.

Although the IMF has enhanced its prestige by its part in the transformation of the issue of Latin American debt from immediate crisis to continuing worry, its involvement in the new phase of debt management over a period of several years at a time has aroused some anxiety, as has the IMF's function with respect to exchange rates in a floating world, and the proper division of responsibilities between the IMF and the World Bank.

In historical theory, the IMF - monitor of the fixed exchange rate system - was concerned with short-term lending to members conditional on economic policy adjustment designed to improve their external balances and thus stabilize their currencies. The World Bank, by contrast, was engaged in long-term lending in projects intended to assist economic development. Since the majority of the IMF's members do not even today, actually maintain freely floating exchange rates, the IMF is still concerned with the exchange rates of those drawing funds from it, and with the macroeconomic policies on which those loans are made conditional. But it has lost its role with respect to the exchange rate system as a whole.

It is a fact of IMF life that the institution will normally be under fire from borrowers for being "too tough", while the governments which provide it with lendable currencies should on occasion claim it is "too soft". A skilful managing director of the IMF - and the present incumbent has some reputation as a politician - must adapt to the changing political views of his paymasters. But this inherent difficulty is aggravated if the IMF's involvement with a particular country or government is not limited to a quick in-and-out involving a short-term programme and loan, but extends over many years.

This is the danger posed by the IMF's involvement in multi-that the IMF will be monitoring country performance over several years, and on its verdict will hang not so much its own loans but the actions of the commercial banks. This development is not without advantages. For a start, the IMF's leadership has enabled the central banks of creditor countries to detach themselves from the negotiations; too great an involvement on their part was always dangerous. Then again, it is not a situation in which the IMF is imposing on the commercial banks, which are in no way obliged to accept its view; rather, the IMF is supplying a service to the international monetary system, at least until the advisory groups of commercial banks have learnt to stand on their own feet.

Yet it would be better if the IMF were to remain detached, and there is a way in which it could preserve some detachment. There are the building-blocks of a better position in the discussion of an enhancement of the IMF's regular currency "surveillance", with the possibility of publication of its reports on members' policies with respect to exchange rates. This would provide some independent source of judgement in a difficult international financial environment, but at arm's length from the business of re-scheduling.

The question remains, however, as to what purpose currency "surveillance" serves with respect to the major economies. At present, it is a farce. Even if the reports were published, they would be no more than a trivial source of embarrassment to those criticized. A more important role for the IMF here is to get back in the forefront of research and exploration into ways of improving our present currency system. For there is just a whisper of change in the air; yet the discussions are circulating outside the institution with historic responsibility.

The casual invitation to an international monetary summit tossed out by Mr James Baker, the new US Treasury Secretary, has been greeted as an irrelevance by most other governments involved. But there is a sense of approaching change in central bankers' warnings about currency volatility, the discussion of target-rate zones, the development of currency blocks like the European Monetary System. In fundamental reform of this kind, power is what matters; the major governments will dispose. But the IMF could propose; it could, at least, be a power-house of ideas.

IN AND OUT OF CARE

Blame for the death of Jasmine Beckford lies neither with social workers nor that convenient scapegoat "society". The child was criminally neglected by her mother and done to death by the man with whom she lived. They, and no others. That they are black and socially and mentally inadequate is irrelevant. That the case of Jasmine Beckford touches on issues about the efficiency of a local authority and the competence of its servants is secondary.

But the child that died had been placed by a court in the statutory care of the London Borough of Brent. Section One of the 1969 Children and Young Persons Act gives as a primary purpose of such care the prevention of neglect. The care order failed: that is the justification and necessity of an inquiry. Its chairman, Mr Louis Blom-Cooper and his colleagues will do well to take as their model the exhaustive investigation of the Maria Colwell case 11 years ago.

What will they find in Brent? They ought to report the chronic political instability of this borough with its effects on staff appointments, and the location in the social services department of an ugly "black power" movement with effects on child care and parental assessments. Some of this will be unpalatable. Already Brent's director of social services has, in the cancellation of her appointment elsewhere, felt the backwash: social workers might well ask why they are so publicly held to account when other municipal professionals, doctors, teachers and lawyers so readily escape the consequences of their errors of judgement.

All these things are important to know: it will be a test of municipal authority to see any critical findings properly acted upon. But the details should not be allowed to obscure issues raised as much by the response to Jasmine Beckford's death as by the crime itself. We all too often entertain the most inflated expectations about the State's competence to intervene in the lives of private households, and especially in the relations of parents and children. This is no figment of the modern welfare State - Queen Victoria's reign saw one hundred separate pieces of legislation passed on the subject of children, not the least important of which was the 1889 Act for the prevention of cruelty which enshrined the principle of governmental intervention. That principle is a foundation stone of civilized society.

But it has in the twentieth century become an open handed invitation to excess expectation about what governments, and the social workers they employ, can do. On no account must the State intervene (Sir Keith Joseph once had his reputation tarnished for suggesting this) to control the fertility of parents; but the State and its tax and rate payers are expected to seize and protect endangered children. And the State's agents, having returned children to parents on the margin between safety and risk, should they mount an expensive vigil at their door?

In local authority social services departments and in the records of the juvenile courts there is now an extensive body of knowledge about the prevention of care orders. It is knowledge increased, sadly, by cases of child death and abuse; using it social workers and the courts attempt clumsily to weigh the claims of natural parents, foster parents and children themselves. As a profession, social work is maturing, throwing off the grandiose theory and naive inexperience of the days of its profligate expansion. Its exemplars willingly acknowledge their limits and give little credence to the myth, beloved of all professionals, that more of them will necessarily serve the public better. More social workers, indeed, would not have prevented the death of Jasmine Beckford - nor would more police officers, doctors, health visitors or any other group of welfare workers. It would be wrong if the hue and cry at her death led to demands for greater State intervention as if that could, in a free society, prevent or exonerate criminal violence.

Case for the water-cooled reactor

From the Managing Director of Babcock Power Ltd

Sir, As the leader of the team responsible for the completion in 1974 of the very successful AGRs (advanced gas-cooled reactors) at Hinkley Point and Hunterston, I can claim to have no bias against the AGR: indeed, in the mid 1970's I backed its selection as the basis for the UK programme. That was 10 years ago.

The comparative failure of the British nuclear industry to exploit its early success can be attributed largely to the vacillation over the past two decades on the choice of which reactor to build.

The last thing the manufacturing industry needs now is a continuation of this constant questioning of decisions, which can only be encouraged by your leader of April 12.

The demand for power plant worldwide is at its lowest level since the 1950's. British companies such as my own have, through very considerable efforts, got themselves into condition to compete internationally, but we must have products that can be sold.

Decisions on projects as large as nuclear power stations are inevitably made in the end by politicians. The probability of any of these gentlemen abroad opting for an AGR against the water-cooled reactor adopted by the rest of the world is negligible and the engineering arguments are not of sufficient strength to affect that judgement.

My plea is, therefore, that we should proceed steadfastly along the PWR (pressurised water-cooled reactor) path on which we embarked five years ago. Nothing has changed to alter the decision taken then.

Yours faithfully,

R. H. CAMPBELL,
Managing Director,
Babcock Power Ltd,
165 Great Dover Street, SE1,
April 15.

From Professor N. L. Franklin, FRSE

I write to endorse your editorial (April 12). I believe it will command the support of many, and perhaps most, engineers and scientists in the industry. Unfortunately, given the preference of the main client, the choice for these many has appeared to be between the PWR and nothing, and therefore between acquiescence and withdrawal from the industry.

Yours truly,
N. L. FRANKLIN,

A union's ballots

From the General Secretary of the Inland Revenue Staff Federation

Sir, Your editorial today (April 11) is seriously unfair to and misleading about the Inland Revenue Staff Federation.

The facts concerning our two ballots on 1985 pay are these. We held our first ballot on Budget day. (It was a work-place ballot because that is what IRSF members had said they wanted in independently conducted market research undertaken well before the 1984 Act.)

There was a 90 per cent poll: the voting was 23,621 for industrial action, 23,782 against, a remarkable result which would worry most employers.

On Budget day members knew that they had an offer of £4 a week or 4 per cent if they were on a pay scale with a maximum above £6,550. Within seven hours of making this offer the Treasury withdrew a most foolish proposal not to increase pay for scarce data processing staff. On March 22 they improved their proposal by offering the best of £4 or 4 per cent to everyone: value 0.02 per cent. On March 28 Treasury increased the 4 per cent figure to 4.4 per cent.

So it was reasonable, I would have thought, to ballot again. This we did yesterday, with the result that 78 per cent of the members voted 21,628 in favour of industrial action, 19,310 against it: a majority in favour of 2,318.

We published to our members the detailed result of the first ballot: we shall do the same for the second.

When you say "Union leaders should know the mood of their members better than this", what have you to say on the same theme to employers?

Yours faithfully,
TONY CHRISTOPHER,
General Secretary,

Television advertising

From Mr J. A. Fox

Sir, In Trethowan's article (The Times, April 1) and Television Today (April 4) was a predictably trenchant argument in favour of the retention of the existing licence fee system. There are few people in Independent Television who would disagree with him.

However, I wish to take issue with two statements which demonstrate somewhat surprisingly that he is not fully aware of the way Independent Television actually operates. First, he asserts that "the ITV companies have a monopoly on television advertising, so they can charge the advertisers what they like".

The downturn in television advertising revenue which started last autumn clearly indicates that this is not the case. Furthermore, the revenue earned by the television companies is far below that which could be achieved if they sold all their airtime at the highest published rate.

I am not saying that the limits of television's share of total display advertising revenue have been reached, but the potential to increase our share significantly is clearly limited. It is a fact that with the introduction of Channel Four and TV-am, the total amount of advertising minitags available for sale has virtually doubled.

This, combined with the increasing demands which the alternative media have made on advertisers' budgets and a need to spend more "below the line", has necessitated a re-evaluation of ITV's already intenssive efforts to sell aggressively the medium in an increasingly fragmented market place.

On the basis of these facts, ITV's so-called "easy monopoly" is a myth.

Second, Ian Trethowan patently misunderstood the relationship between ITV and Channel Four. He says that the answer is... to split ITV and Channel Four so that they would compete for advertising revenue. How this would assist the BBC is not clear.

What is clear is that ITV and Channel Four have widened the range of options open to television advertisers, who are now able to maintain their mass market coverage by using ITV while targeting their campaigns to more clearly defined target sub-groups through the use of Channel Four. Separating the two channels would certainly produce no magic increase in the availability of advertising funds.

It is disappointing that someone like Sir Ian should ignore the fact that the basis of Channel Four's achievements and bright future is that it is part of a two-channel system of broadcasting. That system supports and encourages Channel Four's particular programming aspirations. To split it would be a divisive, retrograde move and a disservice to the public.

Scottish skiing

From Mr P. R. Doyle

Sir, Owing to the geographical nature of the British Isles, it is not surprising that the only properly organised skiing takes place in the Highlands of Scotland. As the season draws to a close, it is an appropriate moment for the Ski Club of Great Britain, with around 20,000 members all over the world, to declare its outright support for the efforts of the Scottish National Ski Council to enlarge the existing ski areas of Cairngorm. The Lecht, Glenishe and Glencoe.

Those who have skied in Scotland will know the frustrations of trying to compete with the hopelessly overcrowded conditions that persist throughout. At weekends in Cairngorm, for instance, when there is snow, car parks are full by 9.15. It can take an hour or more to get to the top of the Coire Ciste car park to the top of the Coire na Ciste tow - a distance of slightly over a mile and a half.

Skiing is no longer the preserve of the rich and privileged: it is a popular and fast developing sport with particular appeal to the young. Opposition to the extension of the ski areas comes principally from the environmentalists - a group which represents but a minute proportion of those actively involved in skiing in Scotland.

The environmental lobby is a powerful one and has the justifiable support of many influential groups and individuals. Wholesale transformation of the Highlands would rightly be vigorously opposed; but the sort of enlargement the Scottish National Ski Council is seeking, if carefully planned, would be a minuscule encroachment.

Yours faithfully,

P. R. DOYLE, Secretary,
Ski Club of Great Britain, 118 Euston Square, SW1,
April 11.

Maintaining services in the villages

From the Director of the Cambridgeshire Community Council

Sir, There are more than 300 villages in Cambridgeshire other than Moleworth.

Between 1982 and 1984 ten of these villages lost their last remaining shop, and eight rural sub-post offices ceased trading. In addition eight pubs shut their doors, four primary schools were closed and one church stopped holding services.

These dismal statistics, which are taken from the Cambridgeshire Community Council's recently published Guide to Village Facilities, illustrate a small part of a national pattern of decline.

The reason for this decline is apparently a simple one. Economic factors dictate a rationalisation and centralisation of facilities and services. But measurements even of economic value depend both on what factors are taken into consideration and on the perspective of the valuer.

A sub-post office may be seen as a limited commercial operation. As such, an individual office in a lowly populated area may well not be viable, but that same office may provide the necessary support to keep the village shop open. It may act as a social centre and an information point. It may also be the only place from which a caring eye is kept on the elderly and isolated in the villages.

The cost to the Post Office of keeping the sub-office open may be less than the cost to the ratepayer and taxpayer of providing these additional services in another way. It will almost certainly be less than the ultimate cost of not providing them at all.

The conventional answer to this loss of facilities is that it is a problem for the local community which should be solved through "use it or lose it" campaigns and self-help solutions like community shops, community buses and, even, community pubs.

There are indeed many impressive examples of self-help in Cambridgeshire. Many of these are well supported by local authorities, by ourselves and by other bodies.

But self-help, even with support, cannot succeed by itself. It can only work on any widespread and long-term basis if there is a clear understanding that certain basic facilities and services will be maintained in any given area.

Without such an understanding self-help will at best be illusory and easily undermined and at worst will be used as an excuse for further reductions in facilities.

The creation of such an understanding even in parts of a rural county like Cambridgeshire requires all sectors of local and national government to develop positive policies towards the maintenance of facilities. Commitment from a local authority, for example, may be worthless without parallel commitment from the Post Office or the health authority.

The development of such policies requires Government to have the political will to take the wider and longer-term perspective and the political muscle to turn policy into action.

Moleworth, by a curious irony, is in an officially designated Rural Development Area. Considerable political muscle is being exercised in the development of these few acres of Cambridgeshire. What commitment is available for the rest?

Yours faithfully,
NIGEL CRISP, Director, Cambridgeshire Community Council, Great Eastern House,
Tenison Road,

Faith and uncertainty

From the Reverend David H. van Daalen

Sir, Whilst one can appreciate John Stott's intentions, in his "Reflections on the Resurrection" (April 6) to make it quite clear that the resurrection of Christ was more than a mere experience of the disciples, and that the risen Christ is real beyond the faith of the faithful, some of the points which he makes must be questioned.

For one thing, his emphasis on the empty tomb is quite unwarranted by the New Testament evidence. Surely, he must know that all four Evangelists agree that the empty tomb did not prove the resurrection of Christ. Luke even goes so far as including a reproach to the women who visited the grave for going there at all: "Why look among the dead for someone who is alive?"

This should not be a matter of controversy at all. On the evidence of the New Testament, the empty tomb was a fact, but it was only on the periphery of the Resurrection.

More controversial is his use of the words "historic" and "physical". Are they really adequate to define the reality of the Resurrection? In spite of all assertions to the contrary, would that not reduce Christ's resurrection to the resurrection of a corpse?

If some people are not happy with qualifying the resurrection of Christ as "historic" or "physical", this is not because we want to deny the reality of his resurrection, nor because we wish to think of the living Christ only as an experience of the believers.

It is precisely because we believe that the risen Christ is real beyond all our definitions and qualifications. He simply cannot be contained in the straightjacket of our poor terms. The risen Christ is a mystery beyond our understanding, yet close enough to us to be known on a personal level.

Yours faithfully,
D. H. VAN DAALLEN, Shalom,
10 Sandwich Road,
St. Neots,
Huntingdon, Cambridgeshire.

Cost of jobs

From Mr Ken Olisa

Sir, As a humble businessman I found "Jobs: choose value for money" by April Davies and David Metcalf (April 9) rather confusing. Given their impressive credentials, it is perhaps churlish to assume that the article was lacking in logic or the application of elementary economics.

I can only assume that the piece lost a little something in its necessarily abbreviated translation from research paper to newspaper. Surely though, whatever the causes, the effect is to provide a misleading analysis of the cost of providing real jobs.

One particular non sequitur will serve to illustrate the point: "Because income tax cuts result in additional savings or more spending on imports, the net cost per job created is almost twice as high as in the case of public investment".

Doesn't every pound spent on imported goods result in the direct employment, in real work, of the sales, support, service, administration and distribution personnel who bring the product to the customer and maintain it subsequently? Doesn't every pound saved (except those kept in the mattress and on the mantelpiece) go into the investment pool - a sum which, when added to the taxes and duties paid by importers, distributors and their employees, provides funds available to private and public sector borrowers to support structural capital expenditure and other laudable government projects such as the Youth Training Scheme and development grants?

And don't such incentives encourage successful foreign suppliers, having built themselves a prosperous UK market, to invest in direct manufacturing here and so complete their structural involvement in the economy? This company certainly did. The manufacture and supply of our products now employs in real UK jobs over 1,000 people directly and many more than this indirectly in spin-off jobs.

All of which must be worth something. I would have thought that it was worth rather a lot and certainly much more than is implied in the quote included above. But then I am only a humble businessman.

Beauty of Bach

From Mr Hugh Keyte

Sir, Major T. C. Morley (March 29) is mistaken. In the real world, what Bach sent to the Dresden court in 1733 was a Lutheran Mass, the Kyrie and Gloria which, with minor revisions, form the first two sections of the B minor Mass as we know it.

A liturgical performance in the electoral chapel would have involved the addition of the rest of the Ordinary from another setting and the modification of Bach's "Lute" text of the Gloria. Not surprisingly, the Dresden performing parts show no sign of ever having been used.

So a new style of Mass-setting could hardly have been insinuated into the Roman Catholic tradition by this route. In any case, what Major Morley calls "settings suited more to a concert performance than liturgical use" (presumably those dividing the text into "numbers" and featuring obbligato instruments and solo vocal display) first appeared in Italy in the early seventeenth century. Any infiltration was in the opposite direction.

As for Bach's supposed willingness to change his religious loyalties, this is nonsense. He was applying not for a conductorship but for an honorary court position, which he thought would improve his standing with the Leipzig authorities. No kind of religious test or compromise was involved.

It is worth adding that four of the five sections of Bach's Mass would find at least an occasional place within the Lutheran eucharistic service. He probably saw the complete work not as a "high Roman Mass" (your second letter, March 21) but as a setting of texts which were part of the shared tradition of the two communions.

Art restoration

From Mrs Sarah Walden

Sir, Your correspondents (April 11) suggest that debate on picture restoration is in a healthy state. That is not the impression of one of the foremost art historians of our time, Professor Sir Ernst Gombrich, who has written a foreword to my book in which he says that his own representations felt "on deaf ears, or rather closed minds".

May I also deplore the inaccuracy of your correspondents in stating that I am not a member of the International Institute for Conservation of Historic and Artistic Works, a body which I have belonged to for over 20 years, and which elected me a fellow three years ago?

Yours faithfully,
SARAH WALDEN,

ON THIS DAY

APRIL 18 1887

A monumental blunder by The Times publicity and ineptitude in Printing House Square. The brief facts: The Times was opposed to Home Rule for Ireland; the Editor, George Earle Buckle, accepted from one Richard Pigott a number of letters which implicated Charles Stewart Parnell the Irish leader in the murders of two British ministers in Phoenix Park, Dublin in 1882, without consulting its veteran experts on Irish affairs, J. Wolfe Flanagan, the paper printed a facsimile of "Letter no 2" with comments on April 18 1887. Parnell did not sue, but in 1888 the Government set up a Special Commission to examine the charges against him; in February 1890 it declared the letters to be forgeries and completely exonerated Parnell; Pigott was hanged, and trapped by the police in Africa, blew out his brains; the whole business cost The Times over £200,000 which crippled its finances, leading to the sale of the paper to Northcliffe in 1906; more expensive was the loss of the public's faith in the infallibility of the paper.

I am glad to hear that your friend's anger has been soothed and that you should know that to denounce the murders was the only course open to us. I do not think that it was properly said that Parnell was a villainous character. But you can tell him, and all others concerned that though I regret the accident of Lord F. Cavendish's death, I do not refuse to admit that Burke got no more than his deserts.
You are at liberty to show him this, and I believe you can trust him, but let not my address be known. He can write to House of Commons.
[Page 4] Yours very truly
Chas. S. Parnell

PARNELLISM AND CRIME.

MR. PARNELL AND THE PHOENIX-PARK MURDERS.

In concluding our series of articles on Parnellism and Crime we intend to deal with the damning facts which were recorded, unpublished evidence existed which would bind still closer the links between the "constitutional" chiefs and the contrivers of murder and outrage. We do not think it right to withhold any longer from the public knowledge the fact that we possess and have had in our custody for some time documentary evidence which has a most serious bearing on the Parnellite conspiracy, and which, after a most careful and minute examination, we are satisfied, quite authentic. We produce one document in facsimile to-day by a process the accuracy of which cannot be impugned, and we invite Mr Parnell to explain how his signature has become attached to such a letter.

It is requisite to point out that the body of the letter is not a copy of his handwriting, but the signature and the "Yours very truly" unquestionably are so.

The body of the letter occupies the whole of the first page of an ordinary sheet of stout white paper, leaving no room in the same page for the signature, which is placed on the fourth page near the top right-hand corner. It was an obvious precaution to sign upon the back instead of upon the second page, so that the half-sheet might if necessary be torn off, and the letter disclaimed.

It is right and necessary to explain that the "Dear Sir" is believed to be Egmont (treasurer to the Land League) and that the letter was addressed to him in order to pacify the wrath of his subordinate, an instance in the Phoenix Park murders - then (on May 15, nine days after the tragedy) still at large and undetected. The anxiety of the writer to keep his address unknown will be noted, and is curious in connection with a belief prevailing at the time that Mr. Parnell was so impressed by the danger he had incurred by denouncing the assassinations as to have applied for the protection of the police on the plea that he was a "person of importance". Mr. Parnell in his letter describes Lord F. Cavendish's death as an "accident", but he "cannot refuse to admit that Burke got no more than his deserts". That is his language to the "Dear Sir", but his language to the public, yielding to what is considered "the only course", or as it stands amended in the text "our best policy", he spoke on Monday, May 8, two days after the murders, as follows:-

Mr. Parnell said he wished to be permitted to express his regret to his friends, on his own part, and he believed, on the part of every Irishman in whatever position he might be, that the most unequalled devastation in the history of crime which had been committed in Ireland... But he wished to express his belief that the crime had been committed by men who absolutely detested the cause with which he had been associated (hear, hear), and who had devoted their lives and carried it out as the deadliest blow in their power against his hopes and the new course which the Government had resolved upon.

Particular attention may now be drawn to the wicked suggestion here made that the Phoenix Park crimes had been the work of the enemies of Parnellism and the League, "devoted to the cause of the desecrated blow in their power against his hopes and the new course which the Government had resolved upon". Has that infamous accusation ever been recalled or even qualified?

The great divide

From Mr Eric Favre d'Arcier

Sir, I am a Frenchman living, for the present, in your country. I am what you call, I believe, a "Froggie". Since leaving my country I have made a number of discoveries, most of them, I must say, pleasant discoveries, some amusing and others somewhat puzzling.

Let me give one example. I thought that in coming from France to England I had crossed a stretch of water called La Manche ("the sleeve" in French). La Manica (the sleeve, also in Italian). El canal de la Manca (the canal of the sleeve in Spanish) and Der Kanal (the canal in German). But I soon discovered my mistake. It is none of these names. It is the English Channel.

I was so surprised I had to check this information with a Michelin map. Please help me in my ignorance. When did this happen? When did the Channel become English? And why?

And I must say what will happen when the Channel is built? Is it to be the English Channel?

Yours,
ERIC FAIVRE D'ARCIER,

FINANCE AND INDUSTRY

Executive Editor Kenneth Fleet

Mr Punch hits DTI with a legal nettle

By next Wednesday, the Department of Trade and Industry, in the person of either Norman Tebbit or his Parliamentary Under Secretary, Alex Fletcher, must pronounce on the request by United Newspapers for "consent in principle" to take over Fleet Holdings, the Express newspaper group.

Some commentators immediately raised a furor over the propriety of asking the DTI to take seriously what was only an intention to bid, rather than an actual bid. Lord Matthews, the chairman of Fleet, hurled back the riposte that a merger between his company and United "appears to have no merit". But he was too wise to tell Mr Tebbit how to do his job, for the Secretary of State has no discretion in the matter: it is enough for there to be a credible intention to bid for the issue to be placed before the Commission's newspaper panel.

If that was the top and bottom of it, we should surely have heard from the DTI by now. The reason we have not heard is that United, a substantial publisher of such diverse titles as the Yorkshire Post and Punch, has presented the DTI and its allied agency, the Office of Fair Trading, with a legal nettle.

Fleet, in addition to its newspaper interests, has the Morgan-Grampian magazine stable and a stake in TV-am. These fall outside the newspaper provisions of the Fair Trading Act. Indeed, they have to be considered, like any other merger of appropriate size, by the OFT, which then makes a recommendation to the DTI as to whether there should be a monopoly inquiry.

That has caused a holdup, as the DTI naturally wants to make the two announcements together. But there is a nasty consequence: there is no overlap between the regular members of the Monopolies and Mergers Commission and its newspaper panel, which is headed by Lord Annan and includes Sir Alistair Burnet and four others. So Fleet and United are faced with the prospect of undergoing two separate but simultaneous inquiries, with all the duplication that will involve. Most frightening of all to the lawyers and civil servants is the precedent which will be created, in either direction. Such a situation has not hitherto arisen. The Monopolies Commission has before now contradicted itself across time, most notably over House of Fraser in recent memory. Two reports with simultaneously contradictory verdicts would outstrip the combined imaginations of George Orwell and Gilbert and Sullivan.

After BNOC, what next?

While the dismantling of the British National Oil Corporation proceeds in a more orderly way than many oil industry people had thought possible the 30 or 40 new sellers of oil who will soon enter the market are considering how they should go about putting their oil on sale.

Therefore, the minds of the oil companies are now being turned to decide what will happen when the BNOC finally disappears in the autumn.

The leading companies will handle the bulk of North Sea output, placing it through their existing trading departments or using it in their own refineries.

But up to 40 smaller companies will enter the market, and although the volumes are small - estimated at around 200,000 barrels a day - that could create some volatility.

The idea of a new consortium oil trading company being set up to represent these smaller companies has already been conceived, but has found little support. The independent traders operating in London could easily handle the work, but many of the smaller companies have voiced their preference for dealing with the trading operation of a larger company.

The most likely to benefit would be Britoil, which has its own trading operation and is recruiting to expand. Hence, Britoil, formed out of the production and exploration assets of the original BNOC, could ironically benefit from the demise of its former parent.

Whatever system eventually emerges, the onus is now firmly on the oil companies to make sure that they do not create a situation in which prices are driven down. For that reason, the summer maintenance programmes could be extended to ease pressure on production at times of market weakness.

The smaller North Sea companies could, therefore, find themselves squeezed as the large operators of the platforms in which they have minority stakes slow production to help the free market price stay up with the official Opec price structure.

J Rothschild goes on Tootal buying spree

Entrad's closely fought bid for Tootal, due to expire today, finally sprang to life yesterday. The Takeover Panel rapped Tootal's chairman, Alan Wagstaff, over the knuckles for premature claims of institutional support. Entrad announced that it will seek a London listing if it wins.

And, perhaps most significant of all, J. Rothschild Holdings announced that it had amassed a crucial 6.4 per cent stake in Tootal after a 10-day buying spree. Jacob Rothschild's company made it clear it had not bought for a small turn but "because we think the shares are attractive at this price" - an implicit rebuff for Entrad's final offer.

Entrad's own move to allow British investors to buy back into the enlarged group through issuing 23 per cent of the share capital to the London market might attract some institutions who want to take a profit but gain a new and bigger potential textile investment.

However, the basic issue for shareholders to decide is whether 72.5p cash per share plus the 1.87p net dividend is enough to pay for Tootal? The exit p/e ratio of over 10 times Tootal's historic earnings, excluding property profits, is generous by the textiles sector standards and the shares will undoubtedly fall back if the bid fails.

But given the growth prospects of Tootal, now the main restructuring has been done, the price still looks a little too cheap. Tootal has spent £100 million on restructuring in the past five years and is now poised for growth in the US, where the massive American Thread subsidiary has been overhauled, and in expanding markets in South East Asia.

Growth is also coming through strongly on the unbranded clothing side, where sales to Marks and Spencer have risen to £30 million against about £3 million six years ago.

Entrad has concentrated its attack on Tootal's failure to exploit its branded clothing and household furnishing. The criticism is justified, but these parts of the total group are only just over 10 per cent of turnover and efforts are being made to put in more marketing managers. Mr Wagstaff has been chairman since January 1981 and he has done a great deal of pruning that should probably have been done before. Shareholders should stay with the company.

Output and jobs increase but King again hits at pay rises

By Sarah Hogg, Economics Editor

Output and employment are rising while earnings increases are slowing down, according to new government figures published yesterday. But Mr Tom King, Secretary of State for Employment, said wage rises were still too high.

The output of the production industries rose 1.5 per cent in the three months to February, compared with the previous three months, and manufacturing output rose 1 per cent. But the February figures showed a slight drop in the production index from January, down from 105.2 (1980=100) to 105.0. The index for manufacturing rose from 101.3 to 102.3.

The production figures were still distorted by the miner's strike. The Central Statistical Office estimates that reduced industrial production by about 3.5 per cent during the three months to February, even though its figures show some recovery in coal production and increased output by other energy industries, which cast some doubt on its calculation. Manufacturing output, which is thought to have been little affected by the coal strike, was 2.5 per cent higher in the latest three-month period than in that of a year earlier.

New estimates from the Employment Department put the increase in the employed labour force in the fourth quarter of 1984 at 142,000, including 32,000 more self-employed people. According to Mr King, this brings the total increase in two years to 600,000.

The fourth-quarter increase of 111,000 employees is made up of 117,000 more jobs in services and a loss of 6,000 jobs in other industries. Later figures suggest a further fall in manufacturing employment, amounting to 18,000 in January and February combined.

The underlying rate of increase in earnings throughout the economy is estimated to have fallen 7.25 per cent in the year to February, compared with 7.5 per cent since last July. But this reduction appears mainly to reflect fluctuations in bonus payments and overtime, according to the Employment Department. The underlying increase in production and manufacturing industries remained unchanged at 8.5 per cent.

Overtime in manufacturing rose slightly, to 11.95 million hours a week in February, according to further new figures from the department, but short-time working also rose, accounting for 0.44 million hours lost a week. The overall index of average weekly hours in manufacturing rose marginally, from 102.7 (1980 = 100) to 102.8 in February.

Wages and salaries per unit of output in manufacturing rose 5.5 per cent in the three months to February, slightly less than the 5.8 per cent calculated from the previous month. However, Mr King claimed that unit labour costs "are significantly above those of our major competitors".

But figures recently released by his department in answer to a parliamentary question show that after adjustment for exchange rates, unit labour costs had fallen 14 per cent in Britain between 1980 and the third quarter of last year, while they had risen 47 per cent in the United States and more than 7 per cent in Japan.

More losses likely, says underwriter

By Alison Eadie

Richard Beckett Underwriting Agencies, a subsidiary of Minet Holdings, has written to its 500 names on three non-marine syndicates indicating that further substantial losses are likely.

The losses are a result of a wave of claims from US casualty business and relate to the years 1979 to 1982. Richard Beckett is in discussion with its auditors to try to put a figure for the likely losses. Names should know the worst in another week or so.

The agency said, in its letter, that it was unable to form any view of the 1983 and 1984 years, except in respect of the incidental non-marine syndicate 618.

The losses, the largest of which relate to syndicates 918, are not unusual in the insurance market particularly on North American casualty business. Metcalf Syndicates, one of Lloyd's largest underwriting agencies, has also been hit with 3,500 names on syndicates 417/418 worst affected.

The losses at Richard Beckett have nothing to do with the previous scandals affecting the agency, when it was PCW Underwriting.

Soft loans ban 'could kill off companies'

By John Lawless

Whole sections of Britain's core manufacturing industries could be killed off, and the existence of some major companies threatened, by the continuing battle between the Treasury and the Department of Trade and Industry over government spending on support for exporters, it was claimed yesterday.

Senior industrialists and bankers thrust the undeclared war between the two departments into the public arena with the publication of the fourth report of the Overseas Project Board (OPB).

They accused the Treasury of living in an ivory tower of pure economic theory - while Britain's major competitors are being given the support of aid and soft loans to win multi-million pound deals overseas, and the tens of thousands of jobs that go with them.

The OPB is the body of businessmen appointed to advise the government on policy on projects worth £2.5 billion to Britain last year, in a shrinking market. It is chaired by Mr Ray Withers, deputy chairman of the Davy Corporation.

His OPB colleague, Mr Robert Owen, a director of Lloyds Bank International, said yesterday that in terms of Government financial support, "there are frequently cases where we are playing cricket and others are playing American football".

Mr Withers admitted that the OPB's arguments come close to saying that "the DTI is battling for Britain, but the Treasury isn't".

BPCC gains £15m despite closures

By William Kay City Editor

Mr Robert Maxwell confounded his critics once again yesterday with a sparkling set of figures from the British Printing & Communication Corporation, which is controlled by his family company, Pergamon Press. BPCC is the country's biggest printer, covering such names as Waterlow, Purnell and Odhams-Sun Printers.

The corporation's pretax profit for calendar 1984 jumped from £22 million to £37.8 million. This was despite a change in accounting policy, as a result of which closure costs of more than £4 million were charged against trading profit instead of being treated as extraordinary items. The improvement is even more marked after tax: £40.1 million compared with £9.6 million.

The extra profits were squeezed out of a £36 million turnover improvement, to £266.5 million. Earnings per share have risen from 16.3p to 29.6p and Mr Maxwell has increased the dividend commensurately, from 6p to 11p.

At 198p, up 4p yesterday, the shares are trading on a yield of 5.5 per cent and price-earnings ratio of 6.7, indicating continuing caution among investors towards the group.

Robert Maxwell: confident of profits trend in 1985

Mr Maxwell added: "Group profits for the first quarter of the current year exceed those achieved for the same period in 1984. The board is very confident of the trend in profits for 1985 and future years."

Apart from closure costs, there appear to have been enough "one-off" problems at BPCC last year to suggest that there is still plenty of scope for further recovery.

The group prints a large number of IPC's magazines, including Woman, Woman's Weekly and Woman's Realm, and last summer's strike there cost an estimated £1 million. Packaging profits were also hit by machine breakdowns.

Espley fails in battle for survival

By Graham Searjeant

Espley Trust, the troubled property-based group once led by Mr Ronald Shuck, asked the Bank of Scotland to appoint a receiver yesterday after six months struggling to survive by selling off most of its assets.

Mr Gary Wakeham, the group's chief executive, confirmed that Mr Ronald Aitken, the company doctor who replaced Mr Shuck as chairman last September, dismissed him from his post as managing director and masterminded the survival plan, had himself resigned.

Espley shares were suspended on the Stock Exchange for the second time in a month in February after pressure from the trustees for loan stockholders for changes in the security on £7.4 million of loans.

Since then Espley has sold property interests in the United States and Belgium, and at the end of last month announced an agreement for £11 million of further sales (bringing the total to nearly £50 million) including Swindon-based Howard Tenens Engines.

That is not being placed in receivership, and the board said it intended to pursue the sale of Howard Tenens Engines.

IN BRIEF

NEI cuts cost £34m

Northern Engineering Industries, manufacturers of electrical, electronic and combustion equipment for the power and communication industries, has completed a major rationalization of its key businesses, spending £34.4 million on below the line rationalization costs in 1984.

The costs included £4 million for mothballing the Gateshead nuclear systems plant, £10 million on restructuring in the US and £7 million for closing the Birmingham electric motor and generator factory.

The company now believes the costs of the restructuring have been fully provided for. North American losses were reduced significantly in 1984 and NEI's businesses there are now operating profitably. The worldwide order intake in 1984 was £700 million and the order book stood at £1.1 billion at the year end against £1.3 billion in 1983.

Pre-tax profits of £40.1 million were made in 1984 against £43.8 million and profits are expected to rise this year to about £47 million.

Temps, page 23

Rio improves

Rio Tinto-Zinc Corporation, the mining and industrial group, has increased pretax profits for 1984 to £670 million, up from £575 million. Turnover rose from £4.811 million to £5,948.6 million. A final dividend of 13.5p makes 20p for the year against 18p last time.

RMC warning

RMC Group, the ready-mixed concrete concern, gave a warning that a sudden fall-off in West German construction activity, together with the poor weather last January and February, would mean lower profits for the first half of 1985. Last year, pretax profits rose from £71.6 million to £81.3 million. A final dividend of 8.6p, raising the total from 12p to 13p, is being recommended.

Scapa issue

Scapa Group, the Blackburn engineering fabrics manufacturer, yesterday launched a £20.1 million rights issue to strengthen its financial position. Shareholders are being offered one new share at 37.5p for every six held. The directors have estimated that pretax profits for the year to the end of March were not less than £27.3 million, an increase of £8 million.

By providing a unique liquid oxygen storage system, AGA have been instrumental in developing a revolutionary power system for submarines, enabling work to be carried out for long periods at great depths.

Successful gas technology on every level.

The AGA Group enjoyed another successful year in 1984, with continuing investment in existing fields and an active search for involvement in new areas of gas technology. Increases of 24 per cent in income after interest and a return on capital employed of 22 per cent show the success of creative efforts and endeavours of the Group on every level.

We concentrated our efforts in those operations yielding the greatest returns for us - namely Gas and Frigoscandia.

Gas Here, our level of investment remained aggressive. We acquired important activities in Norway, and large new plants were built in Sweden and Finland. Acquisitions of other, smaller companies and strong investments in fixed assets have also contributed to our success, and give us the opportunity to pass on our significant and growing expertise in new gas applications.

Frigoscandia Frigoscandia's operating income rose again in 1984, thanks largely to the efforts of Frigoscandia Contracting, which develops, manufactures and markets freezing equipment. This operation now has over 50 per cent of the world market - while Frigoscandia itself is the technical leader in several areas. Heavy investment in technical developments involving storage, distribution and freezing equipment, the sale of our Swiss cold store company, plus a number of acquisitions - illustrate the increasingly selective strategy of the AGA Group.

area is well-equipped and prepared for future development, and - in line with our decentralisation policy - Uddeholm will realise its own future potential.

New markets - new technologies Half of all today's gas applications were still undiscovered ten years ago. In this fast-moving field we are highly optimistic about the future of AGA's gas operations, and are determined to play an active role in the many and varied areas of new technology. For instance, we have pioneered computer-based safety techniques in chemical plants and have introduced a new oxygen-bleaching process into the paper and pulp industry. We are also introducing new techniques for plasma welding black iron. And an advanced method of treating soft drinking water is now being marketed, as is the use of gases in the production of sophisticated electronic components.

Last but not least, we have been instrumental in developing a revolutionary new submarine power system using liquid oxygen.

Future outlook No industry has such a diversified range of customers as the gas industry, a factor that also contributes to making it one of the most insensitive to economic fluctuations. Yet with the help of our industrial gases we can increase productivity, quality and safety in most industries. Indeed, the emergence of these new application areas has formed a base from which AGA can look forward to continued interesting development trends.

Securities loss 'over $500m'

Washington (Ap-Dow Jones)

The chairman of the US Securities and Exchange Commission, Mr John Shad, said his agency estimates that more than $500 million of losses have been sustained by firms and institutions that dealt with ESM Government Securities Incorporated and Bevil Bresler-Schulman Asset Management Corporation, the securities dealers which collapsed recently.

In testimony prepared for the Senate Securities Subcommittee, Mr Shad made clear that this estimate is calculated before taxes, insurance and civil suit recoveries, if any.

Mr Shad told the Senate panel the commission has agreed to report its views to Congress by June 21 on possible modifications of the current regulatory scheme for the government securities market, which is largely unregulated.

Meanwhile the SEC is examining the records of up to 100 companies dealing in repurchase agreements, in an effort to identify potential problems in the market.

The SEC examinations do not include the 36 primary dealers in government securities, which trade directly with the Federal Reserve Bank of New York.

Lords amendment could put back TSB float

By Peter Wilson-Smith, Banking Correspondent

The timetable for the flotation of the TSB Group on the stock market could be put back because of the unexpected setback the Government has suffered on the legislation. On Tuesday, an Alliance amendment was carried in the House of Lords excluding the Scottish TSBs from the legislation.

The flotation is planned for late this year or early next year, and those involved with the flotation were reviewing the situation yesterday.

Similar amendments excluding the Scottish TSBs had already been defeated in the Bill's earlier stages and Tuesday's setback was being blamed in some quarters on the government whips in the Lords. The development appears to have come as a complete shock to the TSB Group and as the Bill now stands, the Scottish banks would be left in limbo because existing legislation under which they operate is being repealed.

TSB Group is likely to resist any compromise solution such as establishing a separate company for the Scottish banks with a large local shareholding.

STOCK MARKET REPORT

Brokers' fears on currency swings fail to hold down ICI share price

By Derek Pain and Cliff Feltham

The shares of Imperial Chemical Industries gained further ground in the stock market yesterday despite conflicting views of how the group is weathering the swings in currency fluctuations.

First quarter results are due next week and most estimates are pitched around £300 million. However, the chemicals team at de Zoete and Bevan, the broker, has been trimming its estimates from £295 million to £280 million.

The brokers emphasize that they still think the shares - which yesterday gained 16p to 782p - bring the two-day improvement to 29p - still offer superb value.

Events on the foreign exchange markets, particularly the pound's firming against the dollar and the mark, have led them to back peddle on their estimates. ICI is still far more exposed to the mark than the dollar, despite the recent expansion in the United States.

Mr Robin Hindle, Fisher of de Zoete explained: "We think that we have probably been over-estimating the profitability of export contracts in the still open."

As a result, the broker has downgraded its forecast for the full year from £1,140 million to £1,120 million. The exercise may be only fine-tuning but it does illustrate the concern felt in some areas about ICI's currency exposure.

At the broker Griesvenon, Grant, the chemicals team agrees that worries about currency swings hurting ICI may have contributed towards depressing the price recently.

Mr Vasant Advani's Grovobell Group should comfortably top £2 million this year after last year's 27 per cent profit advance. Its Atlanta Investment Trust capture is expected to chip in at least £700,000. The company continues to look for medical equipment acquisitions. Grovobell, unchanged at 15p yesterday, has a 14.4 per cent shareholding in Adams and Gibbon, the garage group, resisting a £4.4 million bid from Keep Trust.

But Mr Jeremy Chantry said: "We think the currency fears are exaggerated. The broker is forecasting £260 million in the first quarter and a full-year total of £1,100 million."

As the countdown to the figures gets under way, broker James Capel is in throes of issuing a circular looking towards a £300 million first quarter total and £1,200 million for the year. Mr Robin Gilbert says currency factors may have to be considered later but is expressing no concern yet.

Equities had a good day with the FT 30 share index climbing 9.3 points to 988.8 points, its best level for nearly four weeks. Hopes of lower interest rates - sterling turned in another firm performance - and a varied array of speculative stocks helped sentiment. The FT-SE share index closed 13.2 points higher at 1,304.0 points.

Government stocks, with a little help from the pound, were up by about 2%.

Among blue chips, Imperial Group enjoyed a late burst, up 7p at 187p, as hopes resurfaced that the brewing, tobacco group had at last clinched a deal to sell its troublesome American catering and hotel group.

Howard Johnson, the price movement was helped a little by takeover talk with Hanson Trust, up 6p at 215p, mentioned as the likely bidder.

Commercial Union, the insurance group, touched 222p but closed unchanged at 227p. The market is still hanging on a bid with General Accident now emerging as the front runner. It is suggested that CU's trouble - some American side will be sold off.

Allianz, the West German group which bid unsuccessfully last year for the Eagle Star insurance business, said it had not "made any significant" share purchases in CU and did not play a bid. The highly secretive Swiss Reinsurance Co. was another to deny any CU interest.

Synatels, at 84p, is looking like the perfect "shell". A new issue high-tech flop from James Capel and Co., the broker, the company has promised to repay 6p a share from the remainder of its £20 million new issue proceeds. So the rump of the business, plus residue cash and investments, is in for 24p a share - almost an investor's paradise.

Debenhams, after Tuesday's dip, rebounded 16p to 262p at one time, settling at 260p. Owen Owen advanced 8p to 188p following its profit advance from £1,187,000 to £1,811,000.

British Telecom rose 4p to 141p on talk of a bullish change going the rounds in Tokyo. Racal Electronics firmed 8p to 210p ahead of a presentation today on its new military radio.

Standard Telephones and Cables rose 7p to 204p ahead of next week's launch of its Estril main frame computer. The product is several months ahead of schedule.

British Telecom, the insurance broker, held at 64p. Lander Investments, another insurance group, has acquired a near 15 per cent shareholding and is thought to harbour reverse takeover aspirations.

Mr Maurice Fullerton, Windsor's chairman, has not had talks with Lander and said: "I have not the faintest idea whether or not they will bid."

In the year to end last September, Windsor, formerly Brimhall Beard, achieved profits of £296,000.

There was speculation that London and Manchester Securities could emerge as the property vehicle of Mr David Abell's Suter group. L and M was recently the subject of a bid from Amalgamated Estates, now London Securities, which has placed many of the shares it received retaining a 48 per cent shareholding.

It is thought that Suter has picked up a large number of the L and M shares placed through the market at 7p each.

L and M rose 1p to 94p. London Securities was about 4p.

Banks advanced under the lead of National Westminster which progressed 27p to 599p. Midnet was flat, dropping 17p to 255p on the warning about underwriting loss provisions.

Midsummer Inns, the old CAMRA (Real Ale) Investments which was taken over last year by Messrs Adam Page and Paul Keet, was suspended at 135p. The company appears on the verge of a major acquisition.

Traded option highlights

It was an active day on the London Traded Option Market yesterday with almost 9,000 bargains completed.

Commercial Union was, once again, the most widely traded counter. It attracted 2,150 calls and 485 puts.

British Telecom was another in demand with a total of 1,277 contracts.

The gilts contract accounted for 636 bargains.

RTZ caution casts a shadow over results

Rio Tinto-Zinc is finding it hard to please the City these days. Pretax profits of £670 million up from £575 million and attributable earnings of £211 million up from £172 million were pretty much in line with expectations. The company even provided the 2p increase in the dividend to 20p which analysts had been looking for, but still the share price dropped 14p to 641p.

The main source of disquiet was the less than bullish statement about the current year. A slowdown in economic growth will make it difficult for the industrial interests to maintain their progress, a weaker dollar will erode the benefit of currency translation which added £15 million to attributable earnings in 1984 and conditions in the energy sector will remain difficult.

Even though RTZ is a little more optimistic about the prospects for better metal prices, a big upswing is still along way off.

Such caution is understandable. These limiting factors are beyond RTZ's control and it would be a brave, if not foolish, company which was prepared to predict the outcome. However, the message seems to be that the rate of improvement in 1985 will be slow.

The star performers for the group in 1984 were RTZ Borax, which benefited substantially from currency translation, and RTZ Pillar. However, it may be the energy interests which provide the greatest scope for excitement this year, not only through the RTZ subsidiaries but also through the 29.9 per cent stake in Enterprise Oil.

The group still recognizes that it is not earning the returns on capital, averaging 16 per cent in 1984, and whether the new top management structure, which will more actively involve the heads of the operating divisions in decision-making, will help on this front remains to be seen.

RMC Group

RMC Group, Britain's largest maker of ready-mixed concrete, is heading for a fall in profits this year. The company gave warning yesterday that profits for the first half will be lower than the buoyant corresponding trading period last year.

There seems little chance of making up the difference in the second six months and pretax profits for the full year are unlikely to be much higher than £75 million against £81.3 million last time. The group made £74.1 million in 1983.

The situation in West Germany, where RMC has nearly a fifth of the ready-mix market, compounded by the atrocious weather in Northern Europe during January and February, is more or less the whole story.

There was a sudden and dramatic fall in West German construction activity during the second half of last year which took almost everyone in the industry by surprise. The situation deteriorated further in the first months of this year because of the bad weather. In the first two months ready-mix volume in West Germany was 66 per cent lower than a year ago and by the end of March it was still more than 50 per cent below the first quarter of 1984.

Most of this bad news is already discounted in the company's share price, which has underperformed the rest of the market by more than 30 per cent over the last year.

On the plus side, borrowings are down to less than 30 per cent of shareholders' funds while the group's carefully thought out diversifications in Britain and expansion programme in the United States are beginning to pay dividends.

At 366p, where the prospective p/e is 8.8 and the yield 5 per cent, the shares look good value.

Northern Engineering Industries

Northern Engineering Industries' conviction that its massive restructuring of core businesses worldwide is now over and that productivity and efficiency will flow through this year and beyond is shared by the market. Despite 1984 pretax profits 8.4 per cent down at £40.1 million on turnover slightly ahead, the shares went 9 1/2p higher to 86p.

NEI has spent about £60 million in the past five years reshaping its businesses.

Profits should also recover this year in Britain which showed a 28 per cent downturn in 1984 largely because of a £12.9 million loss on project engineering. Two power stations in Sudan and India were the culprits. The Sudan station is now finished and the Indian one has overcome major problems. The British electrical and industrial side will also benefit this year from the ending of the miners' strike, which cost £2 to £3 million on lost profits last year.

Initial cash payments for big projects are now extremely rare so more working capital is required. NEI ended 1984 with £17 million net cash, against £60 million, and this will probably reduce this year. However, the balance sheet is still strong and, with pretax profits likely to reach £47 million, the prospective p/e ratio of just over 6 is hardly demanding. The yield is also a generous 8.7 per cent.

Record figures for Scottish Widows new premiums in 1984

The Viscount of Arbuthnott, DSC reporting as Chairman of Scottish Widows' Fund and Life Assurance Society.

BONUS DECLARATION

The rates of reversionary bonus declared for 1984 are at the same record levels as for 1983, 5.50% on existing sums assured and vested bonus for ordinary with profits policies and 6.40% for with profits policies in our pension fund. Terminal bonus rates have been substantially increased, as have cash bonuses for with profit group pension schemes.

What we still do not consider satisfactory, is the basis which life offices use for their new business quotations, using current interim bonus rates and showing terminal bonus based on current rates. We shall be much happier when industry-wide agreement is reached on a basis for producing quotations which are not extravagant and over-optimistic.

PENSIONS

The first enquiry chaired by the Secretary of State for Social Services into 'personal portable pensions', now referred to as 'personal pensions', resulted in a consultative document which left much unresolved, and we are still waiting for the results of the wide-ranging main inquiry.

We welcomed the recognition in the consultative document that the arrangements for members of pension schemes to opt out of final salary schemes should be introduced on a basis that would not threaten the stability of such schemes. We are however still concerned that members who do exercise the option will not make enough provision for their retirement at an early enough stage, and may make a decision without a full understanding of what is really a very complicated choice, perhaps without fully appreciating the implications for themselves and their dependants.

INTEREST ON CLAIMS

For many years the Society has paid interest if payment is made more than one month after the date the death claim became payable. We have announced a further improvement in that the interest calculation will in future cover the first month as well.

SELF REGULATION

Following the publication of the White Paper on Self Regulation the Society is encouraged to see the proposals which are supportive of the ROLAC initiative which is not in the nature of a price control but is rather a measure aimed at ensuring unbiased advice and value for money for the consumer. With the aim of improving standards the Society further supports the concept of licensing which offers the prospect of a better trained and qualified salesforce and a more ethical professional selling environment.

STAFF

1984 was once again a year of unusually heavy pressure on all members of the Society's staff, who responded with enthusiasm to a series of new developments and to the challenge of dramatic changes in the environment in which we operate. We thank them for their commitment to maintaining the Society's high reputation in the market as a successful and progressive life office.

Single Premium Business Up 23%

New Annual Premiums for ordinary assurances and annuities Up 30%

Annual premiums for self-employed business increased by 196% and single premiums by 58%.

Large Pension Scheme Business including Pensions Management (SWF) Ltd Annual Premiums Up 29%

Single Premiums Up 76%

INVESTMENT

Of the £134M available for investment by the Society in 1984 plus £122M realised from net sales of equities, £100M was invested in fixed interest securities, £28M in index-linked stocks and £34M in property, while deposits increased by £94M.

Pensions Management (SWF) Ltd generated a figure of £252M to be invested compared with £133M in 1983.

FUTURE OUTLOOK

The Society has taken advantage of market opportunities over the past few years and has improved its new business performance as a result. We have a wide range of excellent contracts, we continue to give first class returns to our policyholders and we have an enthusiastic and hard working staff, so we are confident of continuing to increase our share of the market.

Moore reiterates need for earnings limit abolition

By Richard Thomson

The Treasury issued a strong defence yesterday of the abolition of the upper earnings limit on employers' national insurance contributions, to be considered during the third reading of the Social Security Bill today.

The defence is in the form of an open letter from Mr John Moore, Financial Secretary to the Treasury, to Sir John Hoskyns, director-general of the Institute of Directors, and comes in the face of growing opposition to the NIC measure.

Mr Moore argues that abolition is necessary within the Government's overall economic strategy to fund reductions in insurance contributions for lower-paid employees. These reductions, aimed at stimulating employment for the lower paid, would cost the Government £880 million in the first year after their introduction in October, the letter says.

Abolishing the upper limit for higher-paid employees will bring in £800 million. But employers benefited by a total of £900 million from the abolition of the national insurance surcharge last year.

The letter says that in most cases the change will cost a maximum of 2 to 3 per cent of employers' gross salary expenses. But the evidence was that with higher-paid employees' salaries rising, also at about 2 to 3 per cent annually above inflation, the extra cost could easily be absorbed.

The Institute of Directors said the letter took the debate no further and was a clear indication that the Government was alarmed at growing opposition to the measure. Those opposing the move in the House of Commons are led by Sir William Clarke, chairman of the Finance Committee and Mr Michael Grylls.

Profits rise by 17% at Dewhirst

By Alison Eadie

I. J. Dewhirst, the clothing manufacturer which sell 90 per cent of its output to Marks and Spencer, made pretax profits in the year to January 13, of £4 million, a rise of 17.3 per cent. Turnover rose 27.7 per cent to £4.3 million.

Operating profits rose by 25.8 per cent, but net investment income fell to £268,000 from £445,000, reducing the increase in taxable profits. Trading margins were slightly lower at 8.7 per cent (8.8).

Substantial capital expenditure is planned this year to improve productivity and to increase production capacity in growth areas. Sales in the first 12 weeks of the current year and forward orders are appreciably ahead of a year ago, and the increased sales should result in a continued growth in profits in the first half.

A final dividend of 0.81p per share is being recommended, making a total of 1.10p per share, a 15.3 per cent increase over 1983. A one-for-five issue is also proposed, because of the further growth in the assets and profits of the group.

Reverse takeover for Ambrosiano

Rome-Nuovo Banco Ambrosiano will complete tidying up the heritage left in Italy by the late Signor Roberto Calvi by merging with its financial and investment subsidiary, La Centrale. Technically, it will be a reverse takeover, as the Nuovo Banco will be absorbed by La Centrale which will then be renamed Nuovo Banco Ambrosiano.

Shops still the best property investment

By Judith Huntley
Commercial Property Correspondent

Property investors' love affair with retail property is still to be seen from the new property index produced by Westerbanks Green & Smith, the firm of Chartered surveyors.

Shops have seen better than average rental growth in the five years from 1980 covered in the index. The result has been strong competition for good investments and falling yields. Yields are now at 5.02 per cent with top quality properties being sold at under 4 per cent.

Retail property accounts for 25.62 per cent of the 400 properties, valued at £500 million, in the portfolio used as the basis of the index.

Offices account for 43.95 per cent of the portfolio despite the unexciting performance the sector has turned in. Industrial property on the other hand has fallen from 24.3 per cent of the portfolio to 17.55 per cent. But the agent says rental values could rise this year. If this is the case total returns on property should outstrip the 9.75 per cent seen last year.

The index shows that during the past five years, total returns rose from 100 to 192.12 with capital growth rising from 100 to 141.85. This shows an annual return of 14 per cent and a compound capital growth rate of 7 per cent.

Etam surges 22% with more growth expected

By Jeremy Warner

Etam, the womenswear which was floated on the stock market a year ago, yesterday reported a 22 per cent surge in profits for the year to January 26.

Pretax profits rose from £7 million to £8.6 million on sales 18 per cent higher at £56.5 million. The group's cash mountain also rose from £8 million at the beginning of the year to about £9.5 million.

Results so far this year are ahead of the same period of 1984 and in line with budget.

The board is confident the company would continue to grow steadily by acquiring new trading sites and refitting its existing chain.

On the stock market, Etam shares rose 6p to 162p after the profits news. This compares with the 95p price at which the shares were floated last June by County Bank.

Etam said the capital spending last year rose from £3.9 million to £6.2 million.

Etam has a nationwide network of more than 100 shops

Extracts from the statement by the Chairman, Sir Ronald McIntosh KCB

The rationalisation programme announced in July 1984 has involved a fundamental examination of all our companies. Action has been taken to ensure that their overhead structure is properly matched to expected demand.

The programme involves non-recurring expenditure of £10 million. Some of this has already been incurred and although the programme will continue through 1985 and beyond, the relevant costs have been provided for, as an extraordinary item, in 1984. Reduction of overheads, when the programme is complete, will be of the order of £5 million.

Increased turnover in 1984 was evenly spread around the group. The decline in profit, however, was concentrated on a narrower range of companies mainly in the UK, South Africa and Australia. Most other group companies continued to do well.

High priority is being given to improving the quality and market relevance of the group's research and development. A unique process for cheddar cheese manufacture has been developed; the group's involvement in developing process plant for new biological products has increased; the improved ACCOS automation system has proved acceptable for controlling a much wider range of processes.

The group entered 1985 with a larger order book than it had at the beginning of 1984 and the order intake in the first quarter of 1985 remains encouraging. The benefits of the rationalisation programme and the stricter controls now in operation during the engineering and commissioning stages of large contracts should be increasingly felt in 1985 and 1986.

Asda and MFI turn up the heat in superstore battle

By Judith Huntley

The planned merger of Associated Dairies, the Asda superstore group, with MFI, the furniture retailer, highlights the dramatic changes occurring in the retail sector to which the property industry is having to respond. The move to out-of-town or edge-of-town shopping is well established, with retail warehousing even becoming a respectable institutional investment vehicle.

The property implications of the Asda/MFI deal have yet to emerge and Mr David Gransby, the deputy managing director of Asda Stores, would not comment on the state of play. However, Asda was reputedly the eighth largest property developer in Britain before the merger, with 100 superstores and other property totalling well over 10 million sq ft at the last count.

MFI is no slouch in the property stakes either, with 127 edge-of-town sites for furniture retailing, and plans to add 1 million sq ft of space in the next 12 months bringing its total to 4.75 million sq ft.

The two companies state that they intend to trade separately but if sites become available where they can be sited together they will do so. One of the spin-offs from the merger is that Allied Carpets, part of Asda, would make a nice site companion for the furniture sales.

Both groups are pushing for more sites in the South and South-east, but competition for good ones is intense and prices are very high. So far, both Asda and MFI have been finding new stores themselves. MFI, for example, had a one-for-seven rights issue, underwritten by County Bank, which raised £28.6 million in 1983.

The company says it would have no trouble finding institutional finance for store development, but would take that route only if there were constraints on internal funding.

Although MFI says it has not valued its property assets they must certainly give it a hefty underpinning, as in the case with Asda, with £47 million of freehold and leasehold property added last year.

The expansion of both food and non-food retailers into ever bigger stores on out-of-town sites with large car parking spaces shows no sign of abating. The news came this week that Tesco is to raise £145 million net of expenses in a rights issue to continue its development programme.

The company has gone in for the sale and leaseback method of financing new stores in the past, but now looks more likely to use other means. It aims to add 500,000 sq ft of sales space a year.

This flurry of activity in the market can only help the share prices of companies like Peel Holdings, which has made its name in developing sites for retail warehousing.

NFC Properties, the property development arm of the National Freight Consortium, the highly successful management buy-out, will stand to gain too. It has just obtained planning consent for a 45,000 sq ft MFI store at Ipswich, Suffolk, which will cost £1.6 million.

Peel Holdings has just agreed terms with Payless DIY for phase two of its development of the former Central Electricity Generating Board site at Blackburn, Lancashire. Payless is paying £136,000 a year initially for the 36,000 sq ft store. MFI opens there soon and the third phase will have furniture, carpet, electrical and car product stores. Peel intends to keep the scheme in its portfolio.

The clustering of retail warehouses on the same sites, possibly with food operators, is just beginning to get going. Retail parks are likely to become a familiar part of the shopping scene if the planners allow.

They hold the key to the future of retailing in this country. Sites with planning consent go for large sums: they are scarce. The chance to obtain the best location as well as exclude the competition is why retailers and developers are prepared to pay through the nose. The competition can only get hotter as more and more groups enter the field.

W H Smith & Son is selling its 76,000 sq ft former City headquarters. The freehold of the building, Strand House, New Fetter Lane, EC4, which was designed for Smith's, is on offer, or it can be let (£1.25 million a year). W H Smith moved its retail head office to Windsor, Wiltshire, some time ago and decided to keep only a limited presence in London. It took the 24,000 sq ft Grosvenor House, Holbein Place, at a rent of £330,000 a year, and then decided to dispose of Strand House. Edward Erdman and Montagu Evans advised W H Smith and are the agents for Strand House.

Arum likes idea of Hagler v Curry as next 'super fight'

From Srikanth Sen, Boxing Correspondent, Las Vegas

If Barry McGuigan's challenge this summer for Eusebio Pedraza's World Boxing Association featherweight title through because of a failure to do a deal with US television (NBC and CBS are reported to have dropped out for date and money reasons), we may have to wait two years for a bout such as the Marvin Hagler-Thomas Hearns one to captivate world interest.

There will be lesser bouts, of course, such as Donald Curry, the WBA welterweight champion against Minton McCorn, the WBC welterweight champion, but the one Bob Arum, the head of Top Rank Inc, is thinking of is a match between Hagler and Curry which would be the middleweight champion's last and record-breaking fifteenth defence in 1987.

"It will be the super fight," Arum said. "Of course, between now and then the two fighters will have to do their job and Curry will have to be tested. He is the up and coming contender."

The Hagler-Hearns return has been ruled out for the second. "How could you convince people that the outcome would be any different from last Monday?" Arum said. "You could not sell it unless there was a good chance of a competitive contest."

Hearns is unlikely to be fit for some weeks. It was revealed yesterday that his right hand, which had been damaged previously, was injured in two places in the first round of his world title challenge against Hagler. Hearns's doctor, Fred Lewenz, said: "I don't like it."

If an X-ray in Detroit reveals a fracture, it could account for Hearns's failure to use the right, his most potent weapon, effectively after the first round, though Hearns made it clear that he was not making the damaged hand an excuse. But it raises an interesting tactical point. Whenever Hagler came in close, as he had to do being tightly by his chin and head low and presented the boniest part of the target upstairs to Hearns. Under intense pressure, Hearns was forced to hit the incoming champion on whatever little target was available. That Hagler play, if it was a ploy, and the gash on his forehead, which was believed to have been caused by an upper cut in the first round, seems to square with the damage Hearns's right hand suffered. Of course, this cannot be substantiated immediately.

In the meantime, Hagler said that he was "going to keep on being marvelous" and agreed to defend against John Mugabi, of Uganda. Arum has offered Mugabi $500,000, but it is believed that the Ugandan's British connections may think it trifling after the $8 million and $7 million that Hagler and Hearns are reported to be receiving for their contest, and may turn Arum down.

Clark seeks showdown with England selectors

Gillian Clark, the European Champion, has demanded a meeting with selectors to discuss her surprising omission from England's doubles team at the world championships in Calgary, Canada, in May.

Miss Clark approached the chairman of selectors, Bill Andrew, after winning the European Cup doubles title at Coventry on Sunday and he agreed to discuss her international future with other selectors.

"I will talk about my living and my future as an England international, I believe I have every chance of winning a medal, perhaps even a gold, in Calgary, but the selectors are depriving me of the opportunity," she said.

England's selectors are worried about the possibility of Miss Clark breaking down although she has won the European title, reached an All England final, and won a World Cup. She has also claimed the national title since undergoing surgery for snapped knee ligaments.

Miss Clark, aged 26, wanted to play in Calgary with Gillian Gowers, the girl she partnered to the national title at the weekend. But the selectors have paired Miss Gowers with Helen Troke, England's world-ranked singles player.

Wood stays on track

By John Nicholls

Don Wood's Red Star Night Star, the only British entry in a fleet of 13, was well placed at the halfway stage of the 1,000-mile Deauville race for multihulls. The 60-foot trimaran was at least third and possibly second overall as she beat to windward towards the Ile de Ré, off La Rochelle and the finish, nearby.

All the other competing craft are catamarans, many of them larger, so Wood's first race in his recently acquired boat is so far impressive.

He was dismissed and abandoned by Houllgrave in last year's Weymouth 1,000-mile race. He has since obtained sponsorship from British Rail - hence her new name. Credit Agricole (Philippe Jeantot) was known to be leading the race until the first two days, but her present position is unknown. First of the known boats is Royale (Loic Caradee) with Red Star Night Star only seven miles astern. Région de Picardie (Alain Etienne) is third, with Formula One (Mike Birch, Canada) fourth. The start was delayed for two days because of gales last weekend and the race, now over a shortened course, is expected to finish tonight or tomorrow.

She was originally known as Colt Cars (JB, when she was raced by the late Robert James and then Jeff Houllgrave. Wood bought the salvaged hull and floats after she the rewards are high, an era when some players limp all the way to the bank.

Niely, a graceful runner with an effortless sidestep, had to have pain-killing injections in his knee every time he played a match in the 1984 tour of Australia and New Zealand. His knee still gives him trouble, despite intensive treatment at his club, Widnes. He has been plagued this season by injury and inconsistency.

"I just want a break from rugby," he said. "Just two or three weeks away from it, to forget about rugby completely. Murray Bamford plans to start the summer training camp almost as soon as the season ends, which means no break."

Clark missed Hull Kingston Rovers' vital championship game with St Helens last Sunday because of injury. He acted as a stand-in for a local radio station, and afterwards said: "Continuous rugby for more than two years has left me tired and exhausted, mentally and physically. I've had a couple of Australian tours and two full seasons with Rovers chasing honours, and I feel I need a rest. The thought of a third consecutive summer of rugby is too much."

Gregory's prime reason for withdrawing concerns a new venture. He has gone into the scrap and haulage business with his father-in-law and "just can't afford to take time off during the summer."

Enraged by the withdrawal of three young players from his summer training squad, Maurice Bamford, the Great Britain coach, has publicly condemned their action. Bamford has named a squad of 37 for training in preparation for the visit of the New Zealand tourists this winter and Australia in 1986, and like many people in Rugby League, he cannot understand why three players have rejected an opportunity to play for their country.

The three are Curry, Clark, the Hull Kingston Rovers winger, Andy Gregory, the Warrington scrum half and Tony Myler, the Widnes stand-off half. All three toured Australasia last summer. They are expected to be part of Bamford's plans to restore British Rugby League to the pinnacle, and Bamford said he "found it beyond belief that a young player does not want to play for his country." He added: "These lads have been given a lot by the game. They should be prepared to put something back."

Bamford is irritated because the three could have taken leading roles in the matches between Great Britain and New Zealand this winter. Curry, a fast and strong finishing winger, Gregory an aggressive and elusive scrum half, and the tall, rangy Myler a stylish link between forwards and backs.

"I just can't believe they don't want to play for their country," Bamford said. "I may be old-fashioned, but I believe that loyalty to one's country is one of the greatest qualities a player can feel, and playing for Great Britain is the greatest honour he can receive. The reasons the players have given for withdrawing are typical of an age when the rewards of professional sport are as evanescent as

Spring fever in City lettings

Not even the Easter break could dampen the buoyant letting market in the City of London. A number of deals are soon to be signed up. Land Securities refurbishment at 50 Ludgate Hill adjoining its 26 Old Bailey scheme, is under offer to a firm of accountants through Baker Harris Saunders. So far the tenant's name has not been revealed, but the company will join Deloitte Haskins and Sells which took Old Bailey at £16.50 a sq ft. The asking rent for the 133,000 sq ft of space at Ludgate Hill is £19.50 a sq ft but the market has been set at £3 a sq ft lower.

Land Securities has achieved £16.50 a sq ft on its Cobbs Court scheme in Pilgrim Street, just off Ludgate Hill. Hobson Audley, the solicitor, is taking the space and sub-letting two floors to Berkeley Exploration and Production.

Hastlemere Estates seems to have let all of Bury Court House in Bevis Marks to a financial conglomerate. The rent for the 106,000 sq ft of offices is believed to be just under £24 a sq ft.

Richard Ellis, the firm of estate agents, was about to sign up for three floors when a taker for the whole building emerged. Richard Ellis is looking for alternative premises for its new City office but denies that it will go into the nearby Bevis Marks House developed by United Kingdom Provident Institution.

Tricentrol, the oil company which backed out of occupying Bevis Marks House just before Easter, is still looking for City offices. And Billingsgate Market, no longer to be the home of Samuel Montagu, the merchant bank, appears to have been bought by an owner-occupier. Speculation is rife that the buyer is an American company.

Trevian Holdings, the property company set up by Mr David Dutton and Mr Lewis Davis, has almost completed its largest development yet, the £3.1 million office scheme at Swiss Cottage, north London, with 13,300 sq ft of space and 15 flats.

All the flats have been sold. The offices, directly opposite the underground entrance, will be marketed from about £14 a sq ft.

The company may sell some of its other assets to retain Swiss Cottage in the portfolio. The construction finance was put up by the contractor, J Laing Construction.

Trevian, the brainchild of Mr Dutton, its chairman and managing director, is now traded on the Over-the-Counter market but it hopes to move to the Unlisted Securities Market.

Last year the company made pretax profits of £162,000 with a recommended dividend of 3p a share.

The Crown Estate Commissioners are selling freehold property in London's West End as part of their policy of diversifying into other areas of the capital. The latest sales in the portfolio have realized nearly £4 million.

The largest property to be sold is 76-88 Wardour Street, where 38,850 sq ft went for nearly £2 million. The head lessee, advised by Kenneth Brown & Co, bought the freehold. The adjoining building, 8-14 Meard Street, has also been bought by its lessee, Studio Film Laboratories, advised by Kinney & Green, paid more than £350,000 for 14,110 sq ft. The Wardour Street Garage has been sold for nearly £1 million and R Fraser Securities paid £400,000 for 3,600 sq ft in Maddox Street. Drivers Jonas acted for the Crown throughout.

Five Oaks Investments has sold its 100,000 sq ft factory at Newport, Gwent - developed and pre-let to Innos, the computer company - for £2.8 million. It has been bought by clients of Aurit Services, a subsidiary of J Rothschild Holdings. The Chase Manhattan Bank provided the interim finance for the scheme.

Debenhams, the department store group, which is the subject of takeover speculation, has agreed to open a store in Charterhall Properties' proposed Finchley shopping centre in north London.

Charterhall, in conjunction with British Rail and London Regional Transport, plans a large shopping centre - behind Finchley Road - on land owned by the two transport operators if planning consent is granted. An appeal on the scheme is due to be heard on Monday.

Tenants in search of a new image

The City of London is running out of the kind of office space which is most in demand. New buildings with large, open floors and a distinctive corporate image are being sought by a younger and more aggressive City. Baker Harris Saunders, a firm of estate agents specializing in the City, has produced a detailed analysis of the office market, arriving at new definitions of the inner core, outer core and fringe locations.

Despite the fact that the letting market shows clearly the strength of fringe locations now rapidly becoming acceptable, such as Finsbury Square and Liverpool Street, the institutions will not invest anywhere other than the traditional core area, close to the Bank of England.

Tenants, however, have been forced to move further out to find the kind of buildings they want and they are prepared to pay rents on a par with those near Threadneedle Street. As Mr Michael Baker, the senior partner of Baker Harris, says: "Developers are designing buildings for the tenants, not for the location any more."

Baker Harris reports that there is a shortage of fresh developments this year of more than 50,000 sq ft and this will persist in the inner core for the next three years. Space will become available in 1986-1987 on the fringes of the City, including south of the river at London Bridge City.

The agent says that only 2 million sq ft of space will be available for letting in the City this year, with 65 per cent of the speculative floorspace in refurbished buildings often behind retained facades. These buildings do not always provide the kind of offices which are required by the newly-forming financial conglomerates and, unless rents come down, Baker Harris believes many will stay empty.

Developers who find a niche in the market, however, will see good rental growth. Waite City of London Properties' City Tower scheme at Basinghall Street is attracting tenants at £33 a sq ft. The new Lloyd's building is also letting well, at rents of about £30 a sq ft. The Liverpool Street station development, not yet off the drawing board, is likely to see rents of £27 a sq ft from Shearson, Lehman, part of American Express.

CHOICE

is gratifying to learn that those talkative tea-guzzling chimps have been retired, and now sit in the defiant parents in the play who put life's lessons before scholarship and advocate the educational policy that education planners should consider unconditionally the adult mind instead of concentrating on conditioning the child's.

● FLYING INTO THE WIND (Channel 4, 9.30pm), the second play in David Leland's quartet about what he regards as our morbid educational system, puts an intensely human face on it, in the hands of a lesser writer, could have been an abstraction, is education an obligation that society owes its youth, and one that must be imposed by all costs? Or is it a right that belongs to youth, which youth can accept or reject as it sees fit? I am not convinced that Mr Leland has made out an overwhelming case for life-based education as opposed to fact-feeding in the classroom, but I suspect there will be more than one pragmatic parent watching Flying Into the Wind who will cheer the defiant parents in the play who put life's lessons before scholarship and advocate the educational policy that education planners should consider unconditionally the adult mind instead of concentrating on conditioning the child's.

● MOTHER KEBLE AND HER GENTLEMEN (Radio 4, 8.40pm) is a little gem, 20 minutes of charming Victorian life that draws on the diaries of Letitia Keble, first wife of the Oxford college, Edward Talbot. Clearly, she was the woman who stoked the warm glow in the heart of many an undergraduate 100 years ago. She might easily have been the prototype for James Hilton's Mrs Chip.
